"סבא וסבתא לא צריכים לעשות שום דבר, רק להיות שם כשאנחנו באים. כשהם לוקחים אותנו לקניות יש לחם חרוכה מטבעות למכונת משחקים."

"הם יכולים להחביא את השיניים שלהם."

At 100, Norma Sussman still loves to go out

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

While in her 90s, Norma Sussman was once casually asked if she would be interested in joining her nephew on a road trip – to Orlando.

Without pausing, she agreed, packed her bags, and off they went.

Recently, Sussman turned the milestone age of 100, and a similar, impromptu journey wouldn't be completely out of the question.

"She loves car rides," notes Stephen Creed, who like most people affectionately refers to Sussman as "Aunt Norma," though she is not biologically his aunt. "During the week, she goes out a few times with different nieces or nephews or friends who will take her for drives. At 100, she's still doing that!"

"We gave her an aliyah to the Torah and I spoke on that occasion about her," notes the synagogue's Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl. "She's a remarkable woman."

Sussman found the aliyah experience equally remarkable

"To think I was on the bimah at that time in my life. I just can't express how that made me feel," says the sprightly Sussman, who still lives independently in an apartment.

Her birthday celebrations also included a luncheon attended by 80 guests.

Though she's broken both hips and had some other physical challenges, Sussman's mental faculties are firmly intact.

In fact, just before Sussman turned 100, she recalls, a group of women saw her and a 92-year-old friend out for lunch, and one remarked that it was "lovely to see two ladies, about 80 years old, having lunch."

Norma Sussman

"So my friend looked at her and said, 'This lady, whose hand you're holding, will be 92 in February and this other lady will be 100 in a week.' You should have seen their faces!"

To keep active, Sussman heads out for regular lunches and dinners and knits for family, friends and charity.

"I really enjoy knitting," she say. "My pleasure is at Chanukah when I take all that I've knitted and give it to Jewish Family & Child Services."

Her knitted items have fetched a fair price on certain occasions.

"She knitted an afghan for a charity raffle and it sold for $200," says Maxanne Ezer, whose mother was Sussman's sister-in-law. "She's probably done knitting all of her life."

Sussman was born in Toronto in 1905, and her family roots in North America extend back to the 1850s.

In her younger days, she lived briefly in Montreal and Kirkland Lake, Ont., but returned to Toronto.

She married Philip Sussman, but he was tragically killed in a car accident.

"It could have made me very bitter," Sussman reflects on the shock of his sudden death. "But I made up my mind when I was young that it was better to greet people with a smile, than tell them all about your troubles."

Sussman and her husband never had children, so various nieces, nephews and succeeding generations from both sides of the family have come to occupy a very special place in her heart, as they have for her.

"My husband's family has been absolutely marvelous," she says. "Last night, two nieces and nephews visited me. That's what has helped me go along through life, with my family at my side."

Whole grain products are in for 2006

About Nutrition

LISA WEINBERG

Nutrition is an exciting field that is continuously evolving, but popular nutrition trends are not always positive. This year seems to be different.

We have finally seen the demise of the low-carb, no-carb craze, and we have entered 2006 with popular nutrition trends headed in a very healthy and positive direction. Here is what you can look forward to seeing this year.

Now that people are, thankfully, believing that we don't have to eliminate carbohydrates, but rather to be careful in choosing what kind of carbs we eat, we are seeing a well-received wave of whole grain products flooding the grocery stores.

This is a very good thing. Instead of worrying about how many carbs we're eating, or if there is sugar in our barbecue sauce or salad dressing, we should be focusing on getting more healthful whole grain fibre in our diet to prevent chronic disease and fill us up far more than its white counterpart, which often leaves us hungry, forcing us to eat more.

Because whole grains take longer to digest than white flour, we will eat less now and feel full for longer. Then we'll eat less later and also benefit from the fibre.

As food-makers jump on this bandwagon, we are seeing many products getting a healthy facelift. Several previously white flour foods are now made from whole grains. Look for crackers, cereals, breads, cookies, snack foods (like pretzels), pizza crusts, pasta, bread crumbs and baked goods. When reading labels, keep in mind that it is recommended that Canadian adults consume 25 grams of fibre per day.

In addition, many kid-friendly whole grain foods are hitting the shelves, including popular cereals, granola bars, crackers and cookies, as well as breads, wraps, pitas and rolls. There are even new breads that taste and look like white, but actually contain the same amounts of fibre as some whole wheat breads. Look for these foods as a way to get more fibre into your little ones.

Another new trend that is really great is the disclosure of trans fat content. (Trans fat is the result of hydrogenation of oil. If a product contains hydrogenated or partially hydrogenated oil, that is a trans fat.) This year, companies are required to list how much trans fat is in all products, and we can see what foods contain this bad fat known to lower good cholesterol and increase bad cholesterol.

We should all attempt to eat little or no trans fat. Be careful, though, not to be seduced by flashy claims saying trans fat-free. Companies can make this claim even if there is still a small amount of trans fat per serving (approximately 1 gram) and the company controls what they list as a serving size. So flip the package over and read the nutrition label. Is there some trans fat, and are you likely to eat more than one serving? Be diligent about eliminating trans fat from kids' diets too.

As a result of the new labelling rules, many companies are taking the trans fat out of their products and replacing it with a healthier fat source. This is good news, but beware, because some are taking out the trans fat so that they can make the claim, but replacing is with saturated fat like beef fat or lard. So read carefully.

One more very positive trend on the rise in 2006 is the availability of more choices in natural and organic foods. These foods allow us to eat less-processed, healthier foods with fewer chemicals, additives and preservatives, and now greater variety. The introduction of more of these foods in the mainstream and the interest people are showing in them are making them more affordable and accessible and helping make our food supply ever more nutritious.

Israeli gov't okays release of PA tax revenues

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — The Israeli government approved the release of some NIS 250 million (about $50 million US) in customs and tax revenues to the Palestinian Authority on Sunday, but said from now on the money would not be transferred automatically and would be dependent on the situation in the Palestinian Authority.

The decision to transfer the funds came just 10 days after Hamas' victory in the Palestinian Legislative Council elections, and just two days past the date when the money transfer was due. Israel transfers the money – collected on behalf of the PA – on the third of each month.

Government officials said the decision to transfer the money was taken after it became clear that a transitional government was currently in place in the PA that did not include Hamas. Israel had been urged by the international community – foremost the United States and Egypt – to transfer the money, since PA President Mahmoud Abbas was still in charge and Hamas had not yet joined the government.

Israel also received assurances from Palestinian Finance Minister Jihad Wazir that the money would go to pay salaries and would not fall into the hands of Hamas.

Government officials said the decision was a tactical one taken because Israel did not want to bring about the collapse of the PA at this time and did not want to invite international pressure because of a failure to transfer the funds. The situation will be reassessed next month, acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said at the meeting.

The security services recommended transferring the funds, so the PA would not be plunged further into anarchy and chaos. The money is necessary for the PA to pay the January salaries of some 135,000 employees.

Before the meeting on transferring the funds, the weekly cabinet session heard various security briefings, with Maj.-Gen. Amos Yadlin saying there had been a dramatic rise in terrorist attacks and there were now some 50 attempted terrorist attacks per week.

Yadlin said last week 12 suicide bombers were thwarted at various stages of trying to carry out attacks. He said that terrorist organizations such as Islamic Jihad were trying to carry out the attacks to weaken the PA and challenge Abbas.

Likud Chair Binyamin Netanyahu, meanwhile, blasted the decision, saying, "We are trying to create international pressure against Hamas, so every shekel we give to a Hamas-led government is unexplainable."

In related developments, five terrorists were killed and 11 Palestinians were wounded in two air-force strikes in Gaza Sunday, the Israel Defence Forces said. Several strikes were carried out by the air force over the course of the day in response to Friday's Qassam rocket attack on Kibbutz Karmiya, in which four Israelis were wounded.

A senior Islamic Jihad commander and his aide were killed and three Palestinians wounded after missiles fired from an air-force helicopter struck two cars travelling in the Zeitoun neighbourhood in Gaza on Sunday night.

In an earlier strike, which took place before dawn, the air force struck a building in northern Gaza said to have served as the Aksa Martyrs Brigades' headquarters, killing three members of the terrorist organization and wounding eight other Palestinians.

Russia, China backed referral

the source of plutonium, formally ratify the agreement allowing the IAEA greater inspecting authority and give the nuclear watchdog more power in its investigation of Iran's nuclear program.

The draft also asks ElBaradei to provide the Security Council with his report to the March 6 IAEA board meeting, along with any resolution that meeting might approve.

Chief British IAEA delegate Peter Jenkins urged Iran to heed the resolution before March, warning: "Should Iran fail to comply… it will fall to the Security Council to bring additional pressure to bear."

His American counterpart, Gregory L. Schulte, indirectly acknowledged that the Security Council's hands are tied until March, saying: "We're not talking about sanctions at this stage."

But Jack Straw, the British foreign secretary, said if Iran failed to use the March window of opportunity, action by the UN Security Council would be almost inevitable.

Of the board's 35 member nations, 27 voted for referral, reflecting more than two years of intense lobbying by the United States and its allies to enlist broad backing for such a move. Washington critics Cuba, Venezuela and Syria voted against, while the remaining five abstained.

Still, the near consensus came at a price for Washington. Long an advocate of firm Security Council action against Iran, including possible political and economic sanctions, the Americans had to settle, at least for now, for what is essentially a symbolic gesture.

In fact, agreement on the final wording of the text was achieved only after Washington compromised on a dispute with Egypt over linking fears about Tehran's atomic program to a Middle East free of weapons of mass destruction.

After years of opposition, Russia and China backed the referral last week, bringing support from other nations who had been waiting for their lead. But in return, Moscow and Beijing demanded that the Americans – along with France and Britain, the two other Security Council members with vetos – agree to let the Iran issue rest until March when the IAEA board meets again to review the agency's investigation of Iran's nuclear program and its compliance with board demands that it renounce uranium enrichment.

Israel's Foreign Ministry said Israel welcomes the IAEA decision and "hopes that the international community will send a clear and sharp message to Teheran that it must completely stop its nuclear program." The official statement made no reference to the clause calling for a nuclear-free zone.

Israel's long-standing position on its alleged nuclear capabilities has been that it would not be the first country to introduce nuclear weapons into the Middle East, and that while it supports in principle the idea of a nuclear-free zone, this is unrealistic until there is peace in the region and Israel is not threatened with destruction by countries such as Iran.

The officials also pointed out that Israel feels it has a firm commitment from U.S. President George W. Bush on this issue. In his letter to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon on April 14, 2004, following Sharon's unveiling of the disengagement plan, Bush wrote: "The United States reiterates its steadfast commitment to Israel's security, including secure, defensible borders, and to preserve and strengthen Israel's capability to deter and defend itself, by itself, against any threat or possible combination of threats."

This was interpreted by Sharon as a U.S. promise to back Israel when there are calls for it to dismantle its alleged nuclear potential.

Iran remained defiant following the IAEA decision last weekend, threatening to do precisely what the referral was meant to prevent. "As of Sunday, the voluntary implementation of the additional protocol and other co-operation beyond the Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty has to be suspended under the law," President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said in a letter addressed to Vice-President Gholamreza Aghazadeh.

$15 million gift to day school 'sets new bar'

By CHANAN TIGAY
JTA

NEW YORK — A recent gift of $15 million to a community day school in Rockville, Md., a suburb of Washington D.C., has attracted the attention of Jewish professionals not just because of its size, but because of its goals.

Previous gifts to Jewish day schools were often directed toward the construction of new buildings, campuses or even new schools, but this latest gift to the Charles E. Smith Jewish Day School, among America's largest community day schools, is notable because it's intended to cover operational costs, or what professionals call "capacity building."

That is, the gift is not an endowment or part of a capital campaign. Rather, it's meant to immediately affect students' lives. It's also among the largest-ever gifts to an individual Jewish day school.

"It sets a new bar for investment in day schools and for reasons to invest," said Rabbi Joshua Elkin, executive director of the Boston-based Project for Excellence in Jewish Education.

"What [the donors are] saying is that if we want our school to really realize its fullest potential… the schools need to have the resources to be able to grow the excellence of their program as well as keep their institutions accessible."

The gift –which comprises $10 million to enhance the school's programs and a $5-million matching endowment for scholarships – is being given by Robert and Clarice Smith and Robert and Arlene Kogod through the Charles E. Smith Family Foundation. Robert Smith and Arlene Kogod are Charles E. Smith's children.

The $10-million portion will be given in $1-million dollar increments over 10 years and will allow the school to better integrate art, history and science into its Judaic and general studies curricula, the head of school, Jonathan Cannon, told JTA. It also will aid in developing experiential, informal educational programs, and in offering professional development programs to teachers, he said.

The additional scholarship money will allow the school to offer its education "to the widest possible economic spectrum, and that really meets the priorities of a Jewish day school," he said.

The school is pluralistic and not affiliated with any movement. It has 1,500 students in kindergarten to Grade 12.

The money, said Steven Kraus of the New York-based Jewish Education Service of North America, will allow the school to address some of the major challenges facing day schools.

They include making Jewish education affordable to a wide socio-economic swathe and offering top-of-the-line professional development to teachers, he said.

The donation is one of at least three major gifts to day schools over the last several years. In 2001, the Sidney Kimmel Foundation gave a $20-million gift to the Raymond and Ruth Perelman Jewish Day School, a school near Philadelphia that's affiliated with the Conservative movement.

In 2004, a group of anonymous families donated $45 million to Jewish day school education in Boston. The money was to be spent over five years, with $30 million divided equally among three schools and the rest designated for a tuition scholarship fund and grants for innovative educational projects.

More outposts to go: minister

A day after last week's unprecedented violence at Amona over the demolition of illegal buildings, Internal Security Minister Gideon Ezra pledged the government will continue dismantling such West Bank outposts, with three in the Yitzhar region next in line. "Of course there will be a next time," Ezra told the Jerusalem Post, although he didn't provide details on the impending evacuations.

Hamas rebuffs Bush

A Hamas leader rejected U.S. President George W. Bush's conditions for a relationship. "These demands are unjust to the Palestinian people," Ismail Haniyeh, head of the Hamas slate that won last month's legislative elections, told Reuters. In his State of the Union address last week, Bush said Hamas "must recognize Israel, disarm, reject terrorism, and work for lasting peace."

Egypt presses Hamas

Egypt called on Hamas to renounce violence and recognize Israel. Egypt's intelligence chief, Omar Suleiman, said if Hamas does not make these pronouncements, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas isn't obligated to ask Hamas to form a government. Suleiman made the comments last week on the same day he met Israel's foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, in Cairo.

Sharon gets feeding tube

Jerusalem's Hadassah Hospital said doctors inserted a feeding tube into the stomach of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon as he lay in a coma, a move that signalled his incapacitation could be protracted. The hospital said Sharon, who recently suffered a massive stroke, remained in stable but critical condition.

Planting trees for ex-Gazans

The Jewish National Fund is planting 500 trees at the temporary Israeli home of evacuees from Gaza. The planting will take place at Nitzan, in southern Israel, during the week of Tu b'Shvat, which begins this year on the evening of Feb. 12. The Nitzan event will highlight the traditional planting of trees across Israel during the week of Tu b'Shvat.

Qassam strikes kibbutz

Four people, including a baby, were hurt after a Qassam rocket fired from Gaza struck a mobile home in Kibbutz Karmiya south of Ashkelon. The home belonged to a family that had been evacuated from Gaza last summer.

IIHF pulls tournament from Metulla

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF) has withdrawn a World Championship, Division III, tournament that was to be held next month in Israel.

The IIHF moved the competition to Romania after citing security concerns about the tournament venue, Metulla, which sits on Israel's northern border with Lebanon

The announcement has "devastated" tournament organizers and participants, said Alan Maislin, chair of the Israel Ice Hockey Federation. "I feel like I've been stabbed in the heart."

Maislin said he got the news late last week and there doesn't appear to be anything Israeli officials can do to reverse it. "We're talking to the Israeli government and they'll do their diplomatic stuff. It's gone beyond hockey. It's a political issue," he said.

Maislin said concerns about holding the competition in Metulla were raised by parents of New Zealand players

In December, the terrorist group Hezbollah launched a rocket attack on the northern Israeli town of Kiryat Shmona, near Metulla. There were no casualties. Last week, a Lebanese shepherd carrying a shotgun was killed near the border

New Zealand's Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Trade has cautioned travellers against visiting Israel, suggesting they "defer non-essential travel." The ministry calls travel to the northern border an "extreme risk" and advises travellers to "avoid the area by the border fence with Lebanon."

Astronauts attend Columbia memorial in Israel

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — NASA astronaut Eileen Collins says that despite its size, Israel can be seen clearly from space.

"You can see Israel from space, because it's usually not very cloudy, so you get some beautiful, clear views of the water and the desert. It's very bright, and very beautiful," said Collins, who commanded the shuttle Discovery when the shuttle program returned to space last summer for the first time since the ill-fated Columbia mission in 2003.

Collins added that although she had seen Israel from space many times, she hadn't actually visited until last week.

It was also a first visit to Israel for Collins' colleague Andrew Thomas, the mission specialist on her flight.

"I'm also one of those people who can say I have seen all of Israel, but it's the first time I've been here," Thomas said.

The pair arrived in Tel Aviv Jan. 29, along with fellow crew member Stephen Robinson and family members of the late Columbia crew astronauts Doug Brown, Jonathan Clark, and Lani McCool.

They were in Israel along with Rona Ramon, widow of Columbia astronaut Ilan Ramon, the first Israeli in space, to commemorate the third anniversary of the Columbia space shuttle tragedy.

Ramon co-operated with Israel's Ministry of Science and Technology to organize the week-long trip, which included participation in the Space & Science in Israel 2006 Conference at the Air Force Center in Herzliya, as well as a visit with acting Prime Minster Ehud Olmert, a tour of two Israeli Air Force bases, a private memorial service for Ilan Ramon at his burial place in Nahalal, and a tour of high schools in Jerusalem, Mizpeh Ramon, Nahalal, and Tel Aviv, where the astronauts showed video from last summer's Discovery mission and answered questions about life in space.

The crew's last stop was at Eroni Zi high school in Jaffa. The auditorium was abuzz with anticipation before their arrival, with students nervously practising their questions in English.

"I've been looking forward to this ever since I heard about it two weeks ago!" cried out one fourth-grader.

"It's a very tranquil kind of experience because the earth is slowly turning, way below you, it's quiet, and you have a spectacular view, of course. You orbit the earth 16 times a day, so you get 16 sunrises and 16 sunsets every day, and that's very nice, too," he said.

"It's launching into space is not so peaceful. It's a very violent, powerful event and it's very stressful. We deal with this with a lot of training. We train and train and train and we do it so much that it becomes a familiar experience."

"Is it hard to adjust back to earth after being in space?" asked another student.

"It feels very weird," said Thomas, whose flight last summer was his fourth space mission, with one to the Mir Space Station having lasted four months.

"The strangest feeling when you return to earth is taking the first step. You suddenly feel how heavy your legs are. You can also feel the weight of your organs inside you, which is not very pleasant.

"Also, because a lot of the muscles that you normally use on the ground haven't been used, they weaken. So, you have to do a lot of weight training and exercise when you get back," he added. "But after a few weeks, you're back to normal."

"I spend my free time looking out the window, and bouncing off the ceiling and floor," Collins said.

"There's books and music and movies on DVD. There's also an electric keyboard and a guitar," added Thomas, who explained that on long flights, astronauts are able to take more items with them.

> 'It's wonderful to be together. It's very comforting.'

"There's also e-mail and we now have a telephone, so you can actually phone home."

Rona Ramon noted that the Israeli government has established scholarships in honour of her husband, through which the Ramon family plans to award outstanding students in different disciplines for distinction and community involvement.

"In my opinion, awarding scholarships is the most sensible way to commemorate Ilan Ramon's heritage, so that messages like loyalty, tolerance and love of family, country and humanity are given a good chance to be materialized," she said.

The visit was highlighted by Israeli President Moshe Katzav's official dedication of seven hills in the Negev, located near the Ramon Crater, to Columbia astronauts Rick Husband, Willie McCool, Laurel Clark, Kalpana Chawla, David Brown, Michael Anderson, and Ramon. They all died when the shuttle broke up while re-entering earth's atmosphere on Feb. 1, 2003.

"In August 2003, a mountain peak in the Sangre de Cristo Range in Southern Colorado was dedicated and named 'Columbia Peak' in memory of the crew. Then, on Feb. 2, 2004, seven hills on Mars were named after each of the fallen crew members," noted Ramon, who could also have added the seven memorial sites on Devon Island in the Canadian Arctic.

"These seven hills in the Negev complete a bond of friendship, hope, and exploration that spans the globe from the United States to Israel, and into the broad expanse of space, which Ilan and the Columbia crew so dearly loved."

For Lani McCool, who lost her husband Willie, Columbia's pilot, the highlight of her visit to Israel was the people. "All of us are very connected to each other," she said of the Columbia family members. "It's wonderful to be together. It's very comforting."

McCool has attended memorials in Israel for the last two years. "Coming back this time, I really felt like I was coming home," she said. "That's the best thing about Israel. It feels like family."

Spielberg headlines Jewish Oscar hopefuls

By TOM TUGEND
JTA

Two films that have encountered fierce controversy in the Jewish community and Israel received Oscar nominations last week.

Munich, director Steven Spielberg's take on the Israeli hunt for the killers of its athletes at the 1972 Olympics, did better than expected with five nominations. These include best picture, best director, adapted screenplay by Tony Kushner and Eric Roth, film editing and original musical score.

Some members of the Jewish community have criticized the film for factual inaccuracies and moral relativism, while others have found its examination of the individuals carrying out Israeli policy both moving and compelling.

Palestinian film Paradise Now is among the top five foreign language entries.

Picked among the top five foreign language film entries is the Palestinian film Paradise Now by director-writer Hany Abu-Assad, which follows two suicide bombers from Nablus on a mission to blow up a Tel Aviv bus.

Although the sympathies of director Abu-Assad lie clearly on the Palestinian side, he avoids a simplistic tirade. With excellent acting and a tight, tense plot, the film tries to give an insight into the motivations of the terrorists, their sense of humiliation under Israeli occupation, and their fanaticism as well as their doubts and misgivings.

Immediately after the nomination, the Israel Project, an advocacy group based in Jerusalem and Washington, released an article by the father of an Israeli suicide bombing victim that criticizes both the film and the nomination.

"Nominating a movie such as Paradise Now only implicates the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences in the evil chain of terror that attempts to justify" suicide bombings, Yossi Zur writes.

Nominated in the same category is Germany's Sophie Scholl: The Final Days, about an anti-Nazi resistance cell in Munich during World War II.

Joaquin Phoenix, whose mother was born into an Orthodox New York family, received the nod in the best actor category for his portrayal of country music legend Johnny Cash in Walk the Line.

Jake Gyllenhaal, who also has a Jewish mother – screenwriter Naomi Foner Gyllenhaal – was nominated for best supporting actor in the gay cowboy saga Brokeback Mountain.

Rachel Weisz is in contention for best actress in a supporting role for her performance in The Constant Gardener. The London-born actress' Jewish father and mother fled Hungary and Austria respectively in the 1930s in the face of the rising Nazi menace.

Woody Allen was named for Match Point in the original screenplay category, as was Noah Baumbach for The Squid and the Whale.

Regardless of who walks off with the golden statuettes at the March 5 ceremonies, two Jewish personalities will have key roles, in front and behind the curtain.

Jon Stewart of The Daily Show fame will serve as Oscar host, while veteran producer Gil Cates will captain the 78th Oscar telecast for the 13th time.

Eye on Arts

JASON SHERMAN ADAPTS MAXIM GORKY'S ENEMIES

Prolific Toronto playwright Jason Sherman has set his hand to adapting the Maxim Gorky play Enemies, which is set in early 20th-century Russia and offers "a prescient view of the coming years of Soviet struggle." Sherman has been in close collaboration with graduating students of the Ryerson Theatre School, where the production was set to open on Feb. 7.

The director is Liza Balkan. An acting teacher, coach choreographer, writer and singer, Balkan has built up an impressive curriculum vitae with multiple credits since her work some years ago on Theresa Tova's memorable Dora award-winning production, Still the Night.

Art Garfunkel

The paintings were once owned by Martha Nathan, a German-Jewish Holocaust survivor who died in 1958. Although Nathan sought restitution of much other property confiscated from her by the Nazis, she reportedly never included the van Gogh or Gauguin on the list, having reportedly sold them in 1938 to a Swiss art dealer while she was living in unoccupied Paris.

Eighteen months ago, Nathan's indirect heirs requested the return of the paintings from the museums. After comprehensive research, the museums – both of which have a record of co-operation in the restitution of art stolen or sold under duress during the Nazi era – declared that the paintings were sold voluntarily and that they are the rightful owners.

Last week the two institutions launched a legal manoeuvre to confirm their ownership of the paintings. "The museums believe that, as stewards of the art collections they hold in public trust, they have a responsibility to protect their collections from wrongful claims," said a spokesperson.

The van Gogh painting, The Diggers, dates from 1889; the Gauguin, Street Scene in Tahiti, from 1891. Estimates of their market values were not available at press time.

Tom Lehrer reluctant subject of Greenblatt's show

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Award-winning playwright, performer, director and composer Richard Greenblatt, best known for 2 Pianos, 4 Hands, which he co-wrote with Ted Dykstra, is on stage at CanStage Berkeley/Downstairs until Feb. 25 with just one piano and only two hands – performing Letters from Lehrer.

Tom Lehrer was an American political satirist and songwriter for the BBC television show That Was The Week That Was in the early 1960s. He had a large following, especially in the United States, Canada, England and Australia.

Lehrer was also a math teacher at Harvard and other Ivy League schools. As word had it, he was a reluctant star and never took a liking to performing, but rather considered himself more of a writer. After giving audiences all he wanted to give from the stage, he withdrew from his public.

"I grew up kind of idolizing him. I was first exposed to him when I was about eight. My parents were big fans – I come from a very political background. Letters from Lehrer is a personal journey," says Greenblatt.

"Sometimes people coming to the show are expecting some kind of tribute to Tom Lehrer or some kind of bio play. Although there is biographical info about him, the play is really about me. It is perhaps my reaction to my research into his career and his beliefs."

Greenblatt found Lehrer's address and wrote him in 2002 to let him know that he was interested in doing a show about him, and much to Greenblatt's surprise, he wrote back. Although not overwhelmed with the idea of a show, he did not dismiss Greenblatt's request either. It wasn't until two years later that the busy Greenblatt found time to begin his Lehrer project.

At first, he assumed he would become Lehrer and relive one of his last performances – the play would be about the process of discovering why he gave up performing – but while Greenblatt was working on it, things changed.

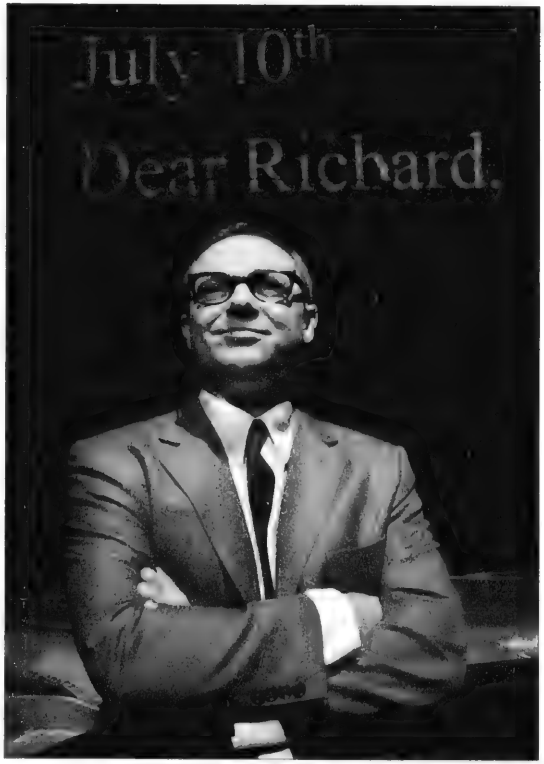
"Arguably, every play has to have a central conflict. I realized that the conflict in the play was mine. There was no conflict with him – he was never naturally suited to the life either of a performer or even an artist, perhaps. Then I realized that the letters that I had written him and he had written me would be the basis of the show, about his rejection of me, because he didn't want to meet me or be involved in the project. I didn't realize it at the time, but it was actually good for my purposes. Initially, I was actually hurt by it. Then I realized he was 77 at this point and can do whatever the hell he wants," Greenblatt says.

"As I say in the play, it is a combination of rejection and challenge that I was really grappling with, my own personal crises of faith. Often in life, we look to heroes and icons to give us inspiration. Ultimately, it is not something you can find from the outside – it is on the inside and based on faith in a political struggle, as opposed to a faith in God.

"I do look upon it as a personal spiritual quest, in order to keep faith. Even in the face of contemporary evidence that the world is run by lunatics, it is still worth it to keep fighting for the things you believe in politically," says Greenblatt, who throughout the 90-minute production uses glasses to differentiate between the character of the bespectacled Lehrer and himself.

Athough Lehrer and Greenblatt both play the piano and describe themselves as atheist Jews (Greenblatt says he incorporates his Jewishness into a lot of his plays), the similarities end there.

"Lehrer has a very cynical edge and I don't. I'm naively optimistic. I'm much more an involved person – I eat the world, is how I put it. I approach life, and from what I can gather, from interviews, as well as my communications with him, he's very removed and likes to keep to himself. As well, he's pessimistic about any kind of effectiveness that political musical satire can have in terms of changing things. I still hope that the world can change and that everything we do adds up to some kind of critical mass… eventually," he says.



Richard Greenblatt as Tom Lehrer.

Next for Greenblatt, he will be teaming up once again with actress Diane Flacks. The two starred in Sibs a few years back. In the spring, they will be at the Tarragon Theatre in Care, about a Jewish couple in the sandwich generation, who are raising a child and caring for a parent who is dying.

"Both Diane and I are Jewish and it very much comes into our work. It isn't what the play is about, but is the basis of where these characters come from," he says.

For tickets to Letters from Lehrer, call CanStage at 416-368-3110 or Ticketmaster at 416-872-1111, or visit www.canstage.com.

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Golda Fried never would have guessed that her first novel, one that was published by an independent, Toronto-based press, would have garnered her the recognition she is receiving today.

Golda Fried

The 33-year-old Toronto native said she was absolutely shocked by the news that Nelcott Is My Darling (Coach House Books) was a finalist for the 2005 Governor General's Literary Award for Fiction.

"My mother called me with the news and we were all shocked," she said.

Although she lost the award to David Gilmour for the Perfect Night to Go to China, she was thankful for the nomination nonetheless.

"It does make a difference. It gives me the energy to keep writing in the future. It helps me get more exposure and helps get [the book] out there."

Nelcott Is My Darling, about a 19-year-old, first-year McGill University student named Alice, tells the story of what life is like for a self-conscious, sheltered girl living on her own for her first time.

While the novel is one that university students can relate to, older generations can revisit the experience as well.

"I was worried it was a story more for younger people. The characters are 19 to 25 years old. But friends of my mother read it and liked it," Fried said.

Before Fried began writing prose after taking a creative writing class at McGill and getting her master's in creative writing from Concordia University, she was more interested in poetry.

"I wrote my first poem when I was 17. It was a birthday poem to my boyfriend and I'm sure it was awful," she said, laughing.

Despite her love of poetry, Fried's first book was a collection of short stories titled Darkness, Then a Blown Kiss, and the second, her fiction novel.

"But I'd like to go back and publish poetry. I love poetry," she said.

When reading Nelcott, it becomes clear that she is influenced by the mechanics of poetry, with similes such as "Alice felt like a teacup full of fear," and "She had waited for it like a telephone wire waiting for birds to come."

"It's not flowery," Fried said of her writing style. "I think it's easy to understand. I try to have poetry points in my writing and use imagery. I try to have a good story line and make it experimental."

Because of the similarities between Alice and Fried – they both grew up in Toronto, went to McGill, love rock 'n' roll music and were involved with the campus film society – it might be tempting to assume the novel is autobiographical.

But despite the fact she drew heavily on her own experiences, as most writers do, Fried insisted that the novel, set in the early 1990s, is fictional.

"Some people say it takes them back to that time at college they'd like to forget," she said, giggling in the same way Alice might have.

"Some people say they've read the book in one gulp, which I appreciate."

She said regardless of the readers' interpretations of the novel, she hopes it'll help others realize that if they are feeling awkward and inadequate like Alice, they are not alone.

"I was really scared and had super-low self-esteem at the time, thinking I was the only one going through it," said Fried, who now resides in North Carolina teaching freshman composition.

"But I don't think I'm that person anymore."

While she has ambitions to keep writing, Fried said that writing her book was a huge undertaking. It took her four years to write Nelcott.

But if and when she does write another book, she suspects that it will be about the same themes as her first novel.

"I tend to like stories about relationships. Ones that are difficult, not the easy ones."

The wartime diary of Kazimierz Sakowicz is "a unique document, without parallel in the chronicles of the Holocaust," according to Yitzhak Arad, the former chairman of the Yad Vashem memorial in Jerusalem.

To this day, it is the only written account of an atrocity recorded by a non-Jew.

A Polish journalist, Sakowicz lived in Ponary, a former holiday resort 10 kilometres southwest of Wilno, which has also been known as Vilna and Vilnius.

From 1941 to '44, when Wilno was under Nazi occupation, some 60,000 Jews were murdered in Ponary. Sakowicz began keeping his diary on July 11, 1941, when the killings had already gotten underway.

Now these entries have been published by Yale University Press under the title of Ponary Diary 1941-1943: A Bystander's Account of Mass Murder. It is a chilling account of man's inhumanity to man.

Wilno, a centre of Jewish culture and scholarship often referred to as the Jerusalem of Lithuania, was part of Russia from the 18th century onward. Poland held Wilno from 1920 to '39, after which it was handed over to the Soviet Union under the Ribbentrop-Molotov pact. Transferred to Lithuanian control shortly afterward, Wilno was formally annexed by the Soviets in 1940.

Germany seized Wilno on June 24, 1941, when about 57,000 Jews lived there. Within days, they were subjected to a series of anti-Semitic measures. By July, the Nazis were ready to annihilate the Jewish community, having assigned an Einsatzgruppe killing sub-unit and a Lithuanian police force – the Ypatingi Buriai – to perform the gruesome task.

The murders were carried out in what had been a Soviet airbase and fuel storage facility in the suburb of Ponary. Large pits, 12 to 32 metres in diameter and five to eight metres deep, had been excavated for the fuel tanks.

The Nazis used the pits for exterminating the Jews of Wilno and environs. Ponary thus became one of several sites in eastern Europe where large-scale massacres of Jews took place.

Sakowicz, a journalist and print-shop owner, was born in Wilno in 1894. He and his wife, Maria, moved into a cottage in Ponary in 1939. On July 11, 1941, the first day of mass executions, they heard the sounds of gunfire. From his attic, he watched the executions.

Sakowicz's diary ends abruptly on Nov. 6, 1943, but he supposedly kept writing until July 4, 1944. The diary, written on loose sheets, was placed in empty lemonade bottles, sealed and buried in the ground, writes Rachel Margolis in the foreword.

Margolis, once a director of the historical division of the Jewish State Museum of Lithuania, discovered Sakowicz's diary while examining documents in Lithuania's Central State Archives. Sakowicz's neighbours had found the diary and given it to the Jewish State Museum, but eventually the diary wound up in the Central State Archives.

"The entries appeared to have been written in great haste, with a trembling hand," she writes. "Working under special lighting and using a magnifying glass, I was eventually able to sort out and decipher the heart-rending entries."

These pages, however, were only a fraction of the diary. In the 1990s, she gained access to the rest of Sakowicz's diary, which was originally published in Polish in 1999.

The first entry in the diary, which Arad describes as "among the most important of Holocaust testimonies," is rather bland: "Quite nice weather, warm, white clouds, windy, some shots from the forest… I discover that many Jews have been 'transported' to the forest. And suddenly they shoot them."

He continues: "By the second day, July 12, a Saturday, we already knew what was going on, because at about 3 p.m. a large group of Jews was taken to the forest, about 300 people, mainly intelligentsia with suitcases, beautifully dressed… An hour later the volleys began. Ten people were shot at a time."

On July 23, he writes. "All together, in the space of 17 days, they have shot an average of 250-300 daily…"

A Jewish neighbourhood in Wilno before World War II

The victims' valuables were snapped up by Lithuanians, Sakowicz notes in at least two separate entries.

In an entry on Oct. 25 described as "terrible Saturday," Sakowicz writes: "One of the Jewish women said to a soldier, 'I gave you all my money and you promised to let me and my child go, and now you lead me to death!' The soldier smiled."

Kazimierz Sakowicz

He adds: "A second young, Jewish woman, 19 to 20 years old, in a gray overcoat and black fur collar, intelligent, with a boy about three to four in a navy blue coat, falls to the ground (full of mud), kisses the feet of the non-commissioned officer and begs for her life, grasps his muddied shoes and pleads. To free his leg, he kicks her in the jaw with the tip of his shoe… On her torn cheek blood gushes out, mixing with the mud."

Toward the close of 1941, Sakowicz writes, "In Sorok-Tatar, a Jewish woman with a child was caught hiding. The woman was shot and the child done in with a rifle butt."

The shootings never seem to stop. On July 30, 1942, he records this entry: "One hundred and fifty old Jews, who had previously been eliminated from the ghetto as unfit for work, were brought by trucks through the gate on the strategic highway… They buried many of them badly wounded. All together about 150 old Jews were executed."

In April of the following year, he makes this observation: "The Jews are nervous, but they go. But when they came through the gate with the barbed wire and caught a glimpse from afar of the pits they understood what awaited them. The younger ones, even women, rushed to escape. A volley is fired.

"The first group in front of the first pit is ordered to undress. Weeping, groaning, pleading, falling to the feet of the Lithuanians and the Germans, who kick them and shoot the most importunate."

Sakowicz continued writing until he was shot and mortally wounded while riding his bicycle on July 5, 1944, his wife, Maria, said. It is not clear who killed him. But most likely, he was accidentally shot in the crossfire between Red Army troops or partisans and German forces.

The fate of the missing diary pages remains unclear. Sakowicz may have hidden them separately from the rest, and they have yet to be found.

We do know that the last 3,000 Jews left in Wilno were murdered in Ponary in the first three days of July 1944.

The SS chieftain, Heinrich Himmler, told SS officers in Poznan in 1943 that Nazi crimes constituted "a glorious page in our history, but it never has been or will be written down."

Himmler, of course, was dead wrong. Sakowicz witnessed the murders of tens of thousands of Jews, and in Ponary Diary, he records these heinous crimes for posterity.

Authors & Poets

The CJN is pleased to announce its Annual Passover Literary Supplement

We invite our readers to submit unpublished, original works of fiction or poetry that explore Jewish themes. Stories should not exceed 2,000 words.

We must receive your submissions no later than Friday, March 10. E-mail submissions are preferred, but works can also be sent by mail or brought to our office.

E-mail: info@cjnews.com. Mail: 1500 Don Mills Rd., Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4.

Please note: submissions will not be returned. Only writers whose work is chosen for publication will be contacted.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN's 2006 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However, they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, Feb. 24, 2006. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 3, 2006.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 16, 2006. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Barreau du Québec or Chambre des notaires du Québec.

Wasserstein chronicled contemporary women

By ABIGAIL SCHWARTZ
JTA

NEW YORK — Playwright Wendy Wasserstein, whose works include The Heidi Chronicles, for which she won a Pulitzer Prize and Tony Award in 1989, and The Sisters Rosensweig, died last week of lymphoma. She was 55.

While not always overtly Jewish, her characters still bore the mark of the playwright's traditional Jewish upbringing in New York.

Obituary

Wasserstein wrote "in ways that are profoundly Jewish," said Joyce Antler, professor of American Jewish history and women's studies at Brandeis University.

Her "ideas of show business came from the synagogue. For her, that sense of theatre as a space for expressing these views was influenced by her Jewishness," Antler said.

In The Sisters Rosensweig, which features three middle-aged Jewish siblings who come together in London for a birthday party, "she was able to have anger at aspects of Jewish family life and yet be appreciative of both the discomfort and warm pleasures of family life," said Susan Weidman Schneider, editor-in-chief of Lilith Magazine.

Even in plays with less overtly Jewish themes, Wasserstein's work reflects the perspective of "a woman who bears demographic accents of a Jewish woman," Antler added.

The playwright, who attended a yeshiva in Brooklyn as a child, "was extraordinary in her ability to be deeply honest in a kind of sidelong and ironic way in writing about her experience as a Jewish woman," Weidman Schneider said.

The Heidi Chronicles covers the life of Heidi, a feminist art historian, over the span of a few decades, from a dance school in 1965 to her decision to adopt a child and become a single mother in 1989 – a mirror to Wasserstein's own decision to have a baby by herself in 1999.

Turin Games another home for 'wandering' hockey star

By CHANAN TIGAY
JTA

NEW YORK — Mathieu Schneider's father calls him "the wandering Jew."

And while, historically speaking, most Jews haven't done their wandering on skates, it's not difficult to see how the term applies to Schneider: over the course of his 17-year National Hockey League career, he's played in six different cities.

Currently a star defenceman for the Detroit Red Wings, he's bounced from Montreal to Long Island to Toronto to Manhattan to Los Angeles and, most recently, to Detroit.

"I've been fortunate throughout my career to play in cities with tremendous Jewish communities," Schneider, 36, said. "I feel as though I've ben a role model in each city that I've played in. There are very few Jewish hockey players, and it's been a nice role for me and I've really enjoyed it."

Along with Washington's Jeff Halpern and Los Angeles' Michael Cammalleri, Schneider is thought to be one of just three Jews in the NHL.

In February, Schneider will suit up for another trip: this one to Turin, Italy, where the "wandering Jew" will strap on his skates as a member of the U.S. Olympic hockey team. It's the second time Schneider will represent the United States on Olympic ice – and this time, Schneider said, he's hoping to just enjoy the experience.

"The first time around there were so many uncertainties," said Schneider, a native of New York, of the 1998 Games. "It was the first time the NHL went to the Olympics. The travel was really tough."

Schneider has played in more than 1,000 NHL games since 1987. He said his religion hasn't been a problem for him on the ice.

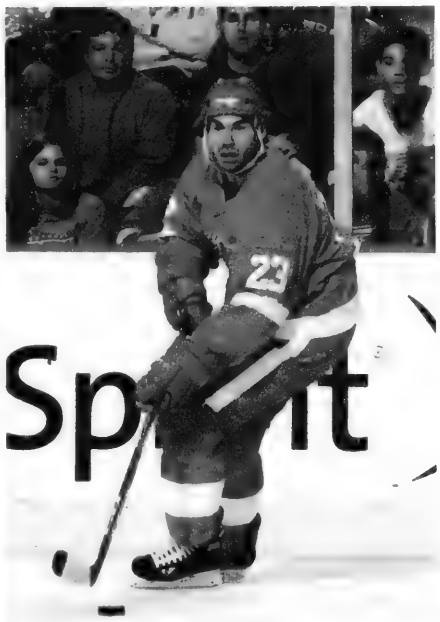
Early in his career, he recalled, there was an incident in which an opposing player unleashed an ethnic slur.

"That was the first time I heard any of that stuff. I made a mental note that the next time I had a chance, I would run the guy into the sideboards. And I did," he was quoted as saying on the Jewishvirtuallibrary.org website.

But outside of that – and one other similar experience at the start of his career – "there's never been any kind of taunting on the ice."

In the intervening years, he said, the NHL has instituted sensitivity training for its players, and Schneider thinks it's working.

"I think society in general has become a lot more aware of it, and the sports world just kind of caught up."



Mathieu Schneider

Schneider, who maintains a home in California and is a member of the Jewish Community Center in Redondo Beach, said over the years, he has made an effort to sit out on Yom Kippur and fast. It's generally not too hard, he said, because the High Holy Days tend to fall during training camp and not during regular season play.

Schneider's mother converted to Judaism to marry his father. Today, he said, "she's probably the most knowledgeable of the whole family" about Judaism.

Schneider and his wife, who has been in the process of converting for the last couple of years, have three children and one more on the way. They are, he said, being raised as Jews.

"As you get older, and especially when you have a family, religion becomes more important. I was raised as a proud Jew and I believe a lot of the lessons Judaism teaches relate really well to family.

"In the times we live in, I think it's very important to give children that sense of guidance," he added. "Jews have always stuck together."

Athletes to watch at the Winter Olympics

JTA

NEW YORK — More Jewish athletes compete in the Summer Olympics than in the Winter Games, but there are still a number to watch in the 2006 Winter Olympics. The Games will be held in Turin, Italy, from Feb. 10 to 26. Among the Jewish athletes are medal contenders Sasha Cohen, Ben Agosto and the ice-dancing team of Galit Chait and Sergei Sakhnovski. Here are some Jewish athletes expected to compete:

Ben Agosto, U.S. (ice dancing),
Galit Chait and Sergei Sakhnovski, Israel (ice dancing),
Sasha Cohen, U.S. (figure skating),
Melissa Gregory, U.S. (ice dancing),
Michael Renzin, Israel (skiing),
Mathieu Schneider, U.S. (hockey),
Jamie Silverstein, U.S. (ice dancing),
Alexandra and Roman Zaretzki, Israel (ice dancing).

Halachic insights into time off

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman C.A.

In the western world, we take it as a given that employees will be paid for many days when they do not actually work. Vacation time, sick days, maternity leave and personal time are all part of standard working conditions.

But these employee benefits are of relatively recent vintage and find no basis in Jewish law, other than minhag hamakom (local custom) – the principle that in establishing work conditions, local practice, not to mention civil law, is binding on all, even if it contravenes theoretical Jewish law. In talmudic times, most workers were hired for the day. The notion of an indefinite hire that is so common today did not exist, thus the concept of employee benefits had no relevance.

Remuneration, Judaism understood, was to be given only for work that was actually performed. To do otherwise would be to unfairly penalize employers. While it may be no fault of the employees that they are sick, it's not the responsibility of the employer either. In the unfortunate situation where a sick employee is in dire economic straits, it is society as a whole – in the form of government benefits – not just the unlucky employer, that would have to supply the charitable funds needed to sustain a person through his illness.

Only in cases where information is improperly withheld could an employee claim pay for work not actually performed. Thus, for example, if you hire a tour guide prior to a planned trip to Israel, but neglect to mention that work pressures often lead to last-minute cancellations, the guide can rightfully expect payment, albeit of a reduced amount.

Recognizing that most workers would willingly stay home if they could still receive a substantial amount of their wages, the reduced amount that is owed is determined by calculating what amount a worker would accept to stay home. Modern authorities assume that for most workers, it's 50 per cent of their wages, which interestingly enough is the percentage the Canadian government pays as unemployment insurance. Of course, if a trip is cancelled for unforeseen circumstances, such as an illness in the family, the tour guide is out of luck.

Being sick has halachic (legal) ramifications in at least two other areas.

In order that employees not have a feeling of servitude, Jewish law grants the worker the right to quit at any time, with no notice. This right, however, is suspended in cases where quitting would cause an immediate and unrecoverable loss – for example a farm worker quitting just as the crops are to be harvested, or a band-leader resigning the night before a wedding. In such situations, reasonable notice – that is, time to find a replacement worker – must be given. Quitting without the appropriate notice may make one liable for financial penalties over and above lost wages.

However, this restriction and possible fine is waived in the case of illness, and not just of the employee, but also the illness of his wife or children. While the employee cannot expect to be paid for sick time, neither can he be held responsible for losses due to illness.

There are also some workers who are entitled to full pay for time off due to illness. As Jewish law forbids taking money for performing a mitzvah, the payment of salaries to those whose work is itself a mitzvah, such as teachers and health care professionals, is based on sechar batala, loosely translated as opportunity cost. In essence, they are paid for not taking a job in another, more neutral field, and they agree to work for "free" in carrying out their mitzvah duties. As they are not being paid for their actual work, salary would not be deducted if they legitimately miss "work."

Jewish emissaries – part 2

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Recently, I wrote an article about individuals who act as Jewish emissaries while living in or visiting small towns or cities with few to no other Jews. I requested reader feedback on their experiences. Here are some paraphrased excerpts that highlight worthwhile interaction between some of these very committed Jews and non-Jews who are sincerely interested in our ways.

URBAN WRITER

Response 1: I produced a CD of Yiddish music that I wanted to take beyond the Jewish community. I was staying in a B&B in a very small, French-speaking New Brunswick town, and rumour had it that there was a Juif (French for Jew) in town. A woman knocked at my door. She had never seen a Juif and wanted to see what I looked like. I welcomed her, calling on my limited knowledge of French and all my hospitality. She confided she had only heard bad things about Jews and was glad I was warm

I also went to Japan as a Canadian representative of a singing troupe. I was on a bus, and people in our group were encouraged to sing to pass the time. I sang the Yiddish song Tumbalalaika. After a woman asked if I would sing the song for her friends, we were whisked off to a huge home in Tokyo. Her friends turned out to be Zimbabwe's ambassador to Japan. There I was in Tokyo, singing a Yiddish song to the Zimbabwean ambassador to Japan. It was an unforgettable evening of camaraderie, education and heimishe frendlichkeit. – Honey

Response 2 – I grew up in Kitchener-Waterloo in the 1950s and 1960s. I remember feeling an awesome responsibility representing the Jewish people in a postwar community with many newly arrived Germans. I was often the only Jewish person that my fellow students knew. When questions were raised about Jewish beliefs, I felt a responsibility to represent my people. Yet, I was aware that I was quite ill-equipped to do so.

Around this time, Kitchener welcomed a young, erudite and socially conscious rabbi to lead our congregation. Your father, Rabbi Shragah Phyvle Rosensweig, through his community outreach efforts, took significant responsibility from my young shoulders. –Merle (Levinsky) Kravitz

Response 3 – In September, a neighbour of mine in Keswick, who had badgered me for months about what colour my Christmas lights would be, then asked me why I was home for so many days in a row around Rosh Hashanah. I told her these were my holy days, then explained the tradition of the honey and apples, and even invited her for dinner. She was very appreciative that I took time out of my "holy" time to explain my traditions. –Lil Nobel.

Response 4: I do business with a family-run company in San Pedro Sula, Honduras. The owners are very religious Catholics. Two of them once visited us, and we were driving to Montreal together when they asked me if I was also Catholic. I told them that I am an Orthodox Jew. The remainder of our two days together was spent comparing religions and generally educating each other. My family visited them several times in San Pedro Sula, where they were sensitive to our kashrut requirements. We, in turn, have hosted them for dinner on Erev Shabbat and on Rosh Hashanah. – Jack Martell, Toronto

Response 5: I work at a community college and was once chatting with a teacher that I don't know well. She found out I was Jewish and began asking the strangest questions, albeit in a very kind way. I realized that despite her formal education, she knew nothing about Judaism. When we met again, she proudly presented me with a vanilla latte and told me she had verified that the coffee was completely kosher by phoning Starbucks. Her kindness and respect was such a wonderful gift. – Heather Pollock, Peterborough, Ont.

Calgary Jewish paper reprints cartoons

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The publisher of the Jewish Free Press (JFP) in Calgary is defending his decision to reprint three controversial Danish cartoons of the Muslim prophet Muhammad.

Richard Bronstein, publisher of the Jewish Free Press, said he decided to publish the cartoons in the paper's Feb. 9 edition as a way of clearing up misconceptions about what they look like and to get readers thinking about whether the cartoons justify the violence that has erupted around the world.

Three controversial Danish drawings published

Bronstein said criticism of the Danish newspaper that originally printed 12 cartoons depicting Muhammad has been "hijacked" by Islamic extremists to promote "an act of political terrorism against European values – against the values of liberal democracies."

In a telephone interview from Calgary, Bronstein said the Danish Muhammad cartoons were part of a larger group of cartoons printed in the JFP that included three anti-Semitic cartoons (two from the Palestinian territories), three historic images of Muhammad that can be found in libraries, museums and art galleries, as well as three new depictions of Muhammad created by Internet bloggers in the wake of the recent controversy.

"I did it to show the hypocrisy that many Muslims are protesting [while] in the meantime, Muslim nations are the world's largest producers of anti-Semitic materials," Bronstein said.

Reaction from the Muslim community in Canada has been critical, Bronstein acknowledged, but also peaceful.

Syed Soharwardy, a spokesperson for the Islamic Supreme Council of Canada, said he met with a lawyer to discuss a possible legal recourse against the JFP and the Western Standard, a biweekly magazine that announced it also planned to run some of the cartoons in its current issue, which was due out on Monday.

Soharwardy told the Calgary Sun he is not attempting to restrict free speech, but he said the Canadian media would never publish cartoons that openly mocked native peoples, Jews or Christians.

The Canadian Islamic Congress (CIC) has asked the JFP to apologize in print for running the cartoons, warning that "otherwise, Canadian Jewish-Muslim relations could be seriously damaged."

U.K.'s Anglicans vote to divest from Israel

CJN Wire Services

The former archbishop of Canterbury, George Carey, says he is "ashamed to be an Anglican" following the Feb. 6 vote by the Church of England's governing body to disinvest from companies whose products are used by Israel in the territories.

The divestment vote, which was backed by the current Archbishop of Canterbury, Rowan Williams, was "a most regrettable and one-sided statement," and one that "ignores the trauma of ordinary Jewish people" in Israel who are subjected to terrorist attacks, Rev. Carey told the Jerusalem Post in a story published the following day.

Please see editorial

Despite backing the vote, Archbishop Williams wrote to British Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks late last week to express "deep regret" for the "deep distress" it caused.

The surprise vote, which came at the behest of the global church's Middle East branch, was approved overwhelmingly by the general synod, the church's chief governing body.

It appears to target the $4-million (US) holdings the church has in Caterpillar Inc., a manufacturer of heavy earthmoving equipment.

The vote to divest signalled the church's long-held concerns that Caterpillar's bulldozers are used by Israel to demolish Palestinian homes. The same earthmoving equipment is used by Palestinians in their own rebuilding work.

The resolution is to "heed the call from our sister church, the Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East, for morally responsible investment in the Palestinian occupied territories and, in particular, to disinvest from companies profiting from the illegal occupation, such

The News in Brief

CANADA

Sportscaster Dies

EDMONTON — Sportscaster and Order of Canada recipient Cecil "Tiger" Goldstick died Feb. 3 at 91 after a long period of poor health. The longtime reporter with CFRN radio and TV was recalled fondly at a funeral last week attended by Jewish leaders and Mayor Stephen Mandel.

Chief Urges Protest

WINNIPEG — A native leader who accuses the National Post of inciting hatred against aboriginals says those who agree with him should protest at Winnipeg's Asper Jewish Community Campus, so the Asper family, which owns the paper's parent CanWest Global, "can hear the anger of First Nations." Terrance Nelson, chief of the Roseau River First Nation, located 80 kilometres south of Winnipeg, called for the protest in a press release titled "Natives should react more like Muslims," the Winnipeg Free Press reported. Nelson's call comes after the Post published a piece by David Asper in November that said federal money for natives is being wasted.

WORLD

Cleric Sentenced

LONDON — A Muslim cleric who fomented hate and incited murder was sentenced last week in London to seven years in jail. Abu Hamza al-Masri, who has described Jews as "sons of monkeys," was convicted on 11 counts, including soliciting the murder of "non-believers" such as Jews, and of having video and audio recordings intended to foment hate. British Jewish official Lord Greville Janner said al-Masri is likely to serve only two years before being released. He's expected to appeal.

Looted Art Resolution

AMSTERDAM — Heirs of a Dutch Jewish art dealer whose paintings were looted by the Nazis will get most of them back. The Dutch culture ministry said last week that 202 of 267 paintings claimed by survivors of Jacques Goudstikker would be handed over, but the rest will stay with their current owners because it can't be proven they belonged to the art dealer when he fled the 1940 German invasion of the Netherlands. His heirs hailed the decision as a breakthrough in a decades-old battle. Many of the paintings in the suit now hang in 17 Dutch museums.

Prof Denies Holocaust

CHICAGO — The president of Northwestern University blasted one of his professors for denying the Holocaust. Henry Bienen said Arthur Butz's comments are a "contemptible insult to all decent and feeling people." Butz, an engineering professor, e-mailed comments denying the Shoah to an Iranian news agency, backing remarks by Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, that denied the Holocaust. For years, at least since the publication of his 1976 book The Hoax of the Twentieth Century, Northwestern has forbidden Butz from discussing his Holocaust views in classes.

Zundel Trial Resumes

MANNHEIM — The trial of Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel, accused of denying the Shoah, resumed last week in Mannheim. His trial was halted last fall when the judge dismissed two members of his defence team for their far-right views. He is accused of repeatedly denying the Holocaust, a crime in Germany, in documents and on the web. Zundel, 66, who was deported from Canada last year, faces up to five years in jail.

Student Faces Hate

PARIS — An anti-Semitic incident took place in a Catholic high school in Paris, according to the National Office of Vigilance Against Anti-Semitism. The watchdog group said a Jewish student was reprimanded late last month for talking in class and as punishment was sent to wait outside the building in the cold, referred to in French slang as "the fridge." Witnesses said that after the student went outside, the teacher said to the class, "If there's not room in the fridge, there's always room in the oven." When the student returned to class, the teacher said, "If you're cold, go into the oven." The student's parents are pressing charges with help from the monitoring group.

Skinhead Hate on Rise

NEW YORK — Racist skinhead activity in the United States is on the rise, says a new report by the Anti-Defamation League. The activity, including an increase in violent skinhead attacks, has been fuelled in part by the Internet, the ADL said, along with a growing hate music industry.

Pioneering U.S. Feminist Dies at 85

WASHINGTON — Betty Friedan, whose 1963 bestseller The Feminine Mystique helped launch the 1960s feminist revolution in the United States, died Feb. 4 of congestive heart failure in Washington. She was 85.

Betty Friedan

In The Feminine Mystique, she used her experiences as a wife and mother to critique the roles of women in industrial societies, and particularly the full-time homemaker role, which she considered stifling. In 1966, she co-founded the National Organization for Women, an influential lobby group.

Born Bettye Naomi Goldstein in Peoria, Ill., Friedan was active in Marxist and Jewish radical circles in her youth.

Jews, Muslims urged to fight against intolerance

Danish cartoons cited as perfect opportunity to band together

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

The global uproar over Danish editorial cartoons that depict Muhammad provides the perfect opportunity for Jews and Muslims to band together and speak out against intolerance, a meeting between the two faith groups heard earlier this month.

"Freedom of the press should not give the media carte blanche to ridicule a whole group," interfaith activist, author and speaker Raheel Raza told the meeting of the Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims (CAJM), held at Temple Sinai.

Raza, author of the recently released Their Jihad, Not My Jihad, was joined by Arlene Perly Rae, who presented a Jewish view. The audience, though small, was evenly divided between Jews and Muslims.

Among the ideas raised was for the association to protest the cartoons in letters to the editor, over the signatures of CAJM co-chairs Barbara Landau and Shahid Akhtar.

On Feb. 6, the Toronto Star published such a letter.

"The cartoons provoke outrage because they demean and vilify Muslims and Islam and do not protect their freedom from such disrespectful treatment," Landau and Akhtar wrote.

"Cartoons depicting Jews as less human or worthy of respect set the tone for the slippery slope toward the Holocaust and ongoing anti-Semitism," the letter stated. "No one would consider it 'freedom of expression' if in the guise of a debate or exercising their 'right to caricature,' someone began questioning the Holocaust.

Jews, Muslims and others who have experienced "such disrespect need to stand together, to say, 'We need protection from such abuses of power by the press,'" the letter said.

In her talk, Raza called the cartoons, first published in a Danish newspaper and denounced as blasphemous by Muslims worldwide, "very blatant hate propaganda" which are contributing to an "epidemic" of Islamophobia around the world.

Muslims and Jews "should watch the media very carefully. It doesn't matter which faith is doing it.

Herzliya Conference (4)

In a session at the Herzliya Conference titled "Demography, Borders and Palestinian Statehood," a team of demographers based in Los Angeles, released startlingly new information regarding the Palestinian population.

In a study called Arab Population in the West Bank and Gaza: The Million Person Gap, published by the Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies, (winter 2006), demographers Bennett Zimmerman, Roberta Seid and Michael L. Wise unequivocally conclude that the number of Palestinians projected by the Palestinian Authority in 2004 to be living in the West Bank and Gaza was decidedly incorrect.

"This study sets the record straight," Zimmerman's group wrote. "Through in-depth analysis and comparison of the existing records, the study measures the 2004 population in the West Bank and Gaza at 2.5 million instead of the 3.8 million reported by Palestinian Authority officials."

The 3.8-million figure gathered, projected and published by the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics (PCBS) was entirely discredited. "Using a 'just the facts' approach, the study revealed major discrepancies in the PCBS forecast. It demonstrated that the 1997 PCBS population base for de facto residents was inflated by the inclusion of residents living abroad and Jerusalem Arabs already counted in Israel's population survey [my emphasis]." Zimmerman's team relied on official Israeli and Palestinian records, such as birth and death records, school enrolment, and actual border-control figures on Arabs entering and leaving the country.

As if the readjusted Palestinian demographic figures were not startling enough, Zimmerman and his team released a second study – the flip side of the demographics coin, as it were – that provided alternative projections for future population figures.

In the study, titled Population Forecast for Israel and West Bank 2025, the research team projected that the Arab population in Israel and the West Bank was actually increasing at a much slower rate than previously claimed.

Using updated figures based on current Palestinian birthrates and migration patterns, they projected a lower birth rate for the year 2025 than the rate of 4.7 per cent previously forecast by the Israel Central Bureau of Statistics (ICBS).

In a series of detailed scenarios that offer assumptions and choices through three different ranges of figures, the Zimmerman team projects a mid-range population scenario of 7.51 million Jews in Israel and the West Bank, 2.20 million Israeli Arabs and 2.24 million Palestinian Arabs in 2025. In this scenario, Jews would comprise 63 per cent of the population in Israel and the West Bank in 2025.

Using the same mid-range case of assumptions, the team projects that Jews would comprise 77 per cent of the population of Israel without the West Bank. In the best-case scenario, the Jewish proportion rises to 83 per cent.

"The assumptions in this new forecast reflect current realities [my emphasis] while considering a full range of potential outcomes that have been neglected by Israeli and other demographers," Zimmerman's team writes. The population forecast study "gives policy-makers and academics a startlingly fresh and more accurate look at demographic realities and possibilities for the future."

Among those possibilities, of course, the demographers are referring to possible political options for the government of Israel.

To the extent that peace-process options are tied to concerns regarding Israel's democratic nature, they are by definition, also tied to the future demographics within Israel's future borders.

The Zimmerman team's revised demographic projections are therefore important new considerations as part of the underlying assumptions for Israeli policy-makers.

More information about Forecast for Israel and West Bank 2025 can be obtained at ben@pademographics.com.

In a session titled "The Jewish World in 2025," Harvard law professor and author Alan Dershowitz spoke of what he perceived to be two developments with dangerous implications for the Jews of the United States presently taking hold in American society.

The first he said was that "anti-Zionism was rampant on American campuses." Dershowitz told the assembly that future generations of Jewish and non-Jewish leaders are being brainwashed against the State of Israel.

He then warned against the potential impact of a new "assertiveness" and "belligerence" on the part of the religious right.

"The trend toward fundamentalism [in America] is increasing," he said. "Many Americans believe that religion is under attack. And who, in their minds, is leading the attack? Secular Jews!"

Muslim reaction has been critical

Calling the cartoons "hate literature," the CIC said in a news release, "This is a devastating setback to Canada's credibility as a moderate, reconciling voice amid the global tragedy these cartoons have already caused."

The CIC statement is attributed to Mohamed Elmasry, a Waterloo academic who came under heavy criticism himself for suggesting on a cable television show two years ago that any Israeli over 18 could be a legitimate target for Palestinian violence.

The Calgary Jewish Community Council, meanwhile, issued a statement disassociating itself from the JFP, which is privately held and which derives its revenues from advertising.

Bronstein said the JFP reproduced three of the Danish cartoons, including one that depicts Muhammad wearing a bomb with a lit fuse as a turban. Another has Muhammad telling suicide bombers that heaven had run out of virgins, and a third showed two veiled women behind a sword-wielding Muhammad.

All the cartoons together were reprinted smaller than a typical Globe and Mail editorial cartoon, he said.

Bronstein said he understands that Muslims are upset by the Danish cartoons, but other religions' sensibilities should also be respected. He said the "violence was carefully orchestrated by radical Islamic clerics from Denmark."

Muhammad has been depicted many times in books, paintings and even as a superhero character in the irreverent TV show South Park without violent reaction, he noted.

Bronstein said he hoped to create a dialogue with the Muslim community about respecting all religions.

He said he planned to offer editorial space to a Calgary Muslim leader to air his views about the controversy.

"I'm not interested in inflaming Muslims in Calgary. I'm interested in talking with Muslims in Calgary," he said.

Most Palestinians back two-state solution: journalist

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Most Palestinians support a two-state solution, despite Hamas' smashing victory in recent Palestinian elections, says an Arab journalist based in Jerusalem.

"Palestinians voted to punish Fatah, not to endorse Hamas' charter to destroy Israel," Khaled Abu Toameh, a freelance reporter who covers Palestinian affairs for the Jerusalem Post, told The CJN last week in Toronto.

Khaled Abu Toameh

Currently on a North American speaking tour sponsored by Hasbara Fellowships and Stand With Us, Toameh spoke at Ryerson University under the auspices of Hillel, and he spoke at a conference on Islamic radicalism, held at the University of Toronto, under the sponsorship of Betar-Tagar and Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies.

Toameh, a 42-year-old Israeli Arab who calls himself "an Arab Muslim with Israeli citizenship," said the Jan. 25 election turned solely on internal issues such as corruption, rather than on the Arab-Israeli dispute.

Palestinians opted for Hamas, a socially conservative and politically radical organization, because they were fed up with the endemic corruption in Fatah and the Palestinian Authority, he said.

"This election was about change and reform. Palestinians didn't vote for Hamas because of its position on Israel. Palestinian voters had no alternative. There was really no third way."

Palestinians gave Hamas, the Islamic Resistance Movement, a clear mandate to replace Fatah as the ruling party of the PA. Hamas won 76 seats in the Legislative Council, Fatah captured 43, while fringe parties picked up the rest. Hamas is expected to form a government, but Fatah's Mahmoud Abbas is likely to remain president.

Toameh claimed PA officials have embezzled some $6 billion (US) in international aid since the PA's formation in 1994. "The PA stole the money of the people while [the late PA president Yasser] Arafat ran the show," he said.

Most Palestinians recognize Israel's existence out of a sense of reality, Toameh said. "At the end of the day, there is a pragmatic willingness to coexist with Israel."

He said Palestinians just want to earn a living and enjoy freedom of movement unencumbered by Israeli checkpoints.

Many backed the Oslo peace process, but lost faith in it when they realized it did not improve their conditions, he said, adding they would agree to a settlement if Israel withdrew to pre-1967 lines, relinquished east Jerusalem and resolved the contentious Palestinian refugee issue.

"That's 90 per cent of the problem," said Toameh. "The majority of Palestinians would settle for compensation. They're waiting for a good offer. They can't go back to Israel, because their villages no longer exist."

Toameh said Palestinians could have had a sovereign state by now if Arafat had set up proper institutions, hewed to the rule of law and adopted a far more positive attitude to peace.

"After the 1991 Gulf War, he was dumped by the Arabs and was fading away. Israel offered the weak Arafat a deal. But Arafat presented Oslo as something he had to do. He was apologetic about it."

Despite his theoretical belief in a two-state solution, Toameh, who calls himself a realist, doesn't think it's workable. "A Palestinian state is against the interests of the Palestinians. It would become another poor, underdeveloped country."

He said the territory encompassing Israel, the West Bank and Gaza is so small that it can't realistically be divided.

"A bi-national state won't work either. You can't have two warring peoples and cultures living in a single state. Maybe a confederation with Jordan is possible, but the Jordanians don't want it."

He added: "There is no solution. We're left in a vicious circle. You can only manage the conflict. That's all we can do. Everlasting peace won't happen, but a long-term ceasefire is possible."

Although there is no credible peace process right now, he said Israelis and Palestinians should try to solve day-to-day issues. "It's better than shooting."

In his view, Hamas will never recognize Israel, "not because they hate Jews but because they believe the land belongs to them."

He said Hamas will abide by the informal one-year truce with Israel because Palestinians are weary of violence. But he added it's very likely Fatah will resist handing over power, thus setting the stage for an armed conflict approximating a civil war.

Barring that, Fatah and Hamas will have to share power. "There may well be a PA with two heads."

Toameh lives in French Hill, a largely Jewish neighbourhood in east Jerusalem built after 1967. He was born in the West Bank town of Tulkarm, but his father was an Israeli citizen.

Toameh is a consultant for news organizations such as NBC News and Danish and Swedish TV, and is also a film producer specializing in Palestinian topics. He wrote for Al Fajr, a PLO-owned paper in Jerusalem, in the 1980s, and has written for the Globe and Mail. He joined the Post several years ago.

Hillel fails to change name of anti-Israel event at U of T

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The University of Toronto's student affairs office has turned down Hillel's request for the school to force the Arab Students' Collective to change the name of its Israeli Apartheid Week to omit the word "apartheid."

Jim Delaney, assistant director of student affairs at U of T, who is responsible for matters related to controversial events and freedom of speech, said his position has not changed since last year, when members of the Jewish community urged the university to cancel the event.

"There are no grounds for censoring the use of the word 'apartheid,'" Delaney said.

"The university will not attempt to censor, control or interfere with any group on the basis of its philosophy, beliefs, interests or opinions expressed unless and until these lead to activities which are illegal or which infringe the rights of others," he added.

Delaney said Israeli Apartheid Week was organized by a student group, not the university, but "behaviour or speech that constitutes hatred or incitement to hatred against any group will be dealt with quickly and appropriately."

He added that staff and students need to understand that being a part of the university community means they may be confronted with ideas they find difficult to accept.

"I would also point out that there are many students with many different views and questions related to the Middle East. The views expressed by groups such as the Arab Students' Collective and Betar-Tagar [co-sponsors of Know Radical-Islam Week, held last week at U of T] are not representative of all students. Indeed, there are a great many students working towards dialogue on these issues," Delaney said.

Israeli Apartheid Week, which began on Feb. 13 and runs to Feb. 17, included lectures titled "South Africa and Israel: The Apartheid Connection," "The Ethnic Cleansing of Palestine and the Right of Return," "The Myth of Israeli Democracy: The Case of Unrecognized Palestinian Villages," and "The Gaza 'Disengagement:' Apartheid Entrenched."

The Arab Students' Collective has also planned a demonstration at Dundas Square at Yonge and Dundas streets to protest Canada's support for Israel.

In an ad posted on the New Socialist Group website, it said Israeli Apartheid Week and the demonstration are meant to "develop the understanding of Israel as an apartheid state and to build a boycott, divestment, and sanctions movement against Israeli apartheid."

The posting encourages readers to call on Ottawa to boycott Israeli products and services.

"Israeli wines are being carried and sold in government-controlled liquor stores across Canada, and Israeli corporations like Amdocs and El Al are allowed free rein to operate in Canada.

"This can only be done with the political support of the Canadian government. This is why we are calling for a movement that will target such institutions."

'We need to make hate a common enemy'

"We should stand together. We need to make hate a common enemy."

Speaking to the Muslims in the audience, Perly Rae said both anti-Semitism and Islamophobia are forms of racism and xenophobia that are rooted in stereotypes. Allowed to fester, both will be "threats to liberty."

For Jews in Canada, there are "several 'no-go' areas," Perly Rae explained. Most upsetting is Holocaust denial.

"It's deliberate and profoundly wounding. Denying the Holocaust is like killing the victims all over again. The pain is indescribable. It's like telling blacks that slavery never happened. Every suicide bombing brings back the trauma of it."

"It has nothing to do with borders or fences or annexations," she said. "We should not allow the Middle East to serve as a pretext for anti-Semitism or Islamophobia."

She also urged an end to singling out Israel. "If you're going to criticize Israel, do so to all others."

Perly Rae and Raza proposed similar action plans. Both advocated grassroots efforts aimed at young people. Perly Rae called for a return to teaching civics and citizenship, and for joint programs between Muslims and Jews to "restore civility" on university campuses.

Both faiths must resolve to "fight lies, denounce terrorism and hatred," and work toward reconciliation, she said.

"There has to be lots and lots of dialogue. And cooler heads should prevail."

Raza said Muslims and Jews "need to work together and pray together. Sometimes, people of faith need to come together. The most tragic issue is silence."

Divestment disgrace

The Church of England last week voted to divest from companies whose products are used by the Israeli government in the West Bank. The motion adopted by the ecclesiastical body read, in part: "The General Synod heeds the call from our sister church, the Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East, for morally responsible investment in the Palestinian occupied territories and, in particular, to disinvest from companies profiting from the illegal occupation, such as Caterpillar Inc, until they change their policies."

Not all Anglicans in Britain supported the vote. Some were even embarrased. The former archbishop of Canterbury, George Carey, said that he was "ashamed to be an Anglican." And no wonder. The decision was an affront to elementary fairness. In the guise of high-sounding, theologically wrapped ethics, it was yet another polemical attack on the Jewish state that was oblivious to context and contemptuous of truth.

The church invoked the by-now routine, though still emotionally charged, false accusation of "illegal occupation" without any reference to Israel's many attempts to find an accommodation with the Palestinians, without any mention of the terrorist war that was launched against the Jewish state in the very midst of its futile efforts at negotiating an end to the conflict with the Palestinians. To use Lord Carey's words, the resolution was a "one-sided statement" that "ignores the trauma of ordinary Jewish people" in Israel subjected to terrorist attacks.

That the resolution enjoyed the full backing of the current Archbishop of Canterbury, Rowan Williams, merely added to the injury and increasing uneasiness felt by British Jews.

Jon Benjamin, the chief executive officer of the Board of Deputies of British Jews, called the vote "simplistic" and "unbalanced." "Israel will be criticized regardless of what happens," he added. "[For the Church of England] nothing Israel ever will do will be right, while nothing the Palestinians will do will ever be wrong," Benjamin said.

Dr. Irene Lancaster, of the Centre for Jewish Studies at Manchester University, spoke even more ominously, calling the vote "a very black day for Anglican-Jewish relations."

"The writing is on the wall for the Jews of Great Britain, 350 years after they settled here," she added. "The Jewish community will have to reconsider their attitude to interfaith work with the Anglican community."

The Anglicans' broadside against Israel will merely serve to strengthen hatred against Israel in the hearts of the Jewish state's vilifiers. In its own dangerous way, it will also lend more crooked credence to the constant and perverse frothing against Israel by the extremist regime in Iran and its Islamist allies in Hezbollah, Islamic Jihad and Hamas.

In its least harmful manifestation, the synod's vote was merely failed theology. But at its most harmful, it was a demagogic disgrace that utterly fails its own call for "morally responsible" behaviour.

Pope John Paul II met with Elio Toaff, chief rabbi of Rome, in a building in the heart of Rome's Jewish ghetto. It was the first time in 2,000 years that a chief rabbi of Rome had accepted an invitation to meet with a pope. There have been Jews in Rome since Judah Maccabee sent a diplomatic delegation there in 160 BCE. Pope Paul IV established the Roman ghetto in 1555 CE.

Coverage of Amona incomplete

Maybe a picture is worth a thousand words! That is the only explanation I have for a picture and a very short "factual" description being the only reference in The CJN to the tragedy that occurred at Amona ("Violence at Amona," Feb. 9). It seems to me that this very significant event of Israeli citizens being assaulted by their own police and soldiers on horseback, and being beaten mercilessly, merits questioning and soul searching. What happened, who was injured, and how and why did the situation escalate into such violence? Were these events politically motivated, as was suggested by both the right- and left-wing newspapers in Israel? We need these questions answered. It is up to The CJN to provide Canadian Jews with full coverage of such an important event. The headline should have read: Amona, NEVER AGAIN!

Coverage of Amona misleading

From the video clips taken at Amona, all can clearly see police brutally smashing the heads of unarmed children sitting in protest. To state, "Some people accused the police of acting with too heavy a hand" is simply misleading the public ("Violence at Amona," CJN, Feb. 9). Police brutality at Amona is now a well-known fact, and it would behoove responsible media to demand justice for this unwarranted cruelty toward children. The speculation is only about who ordered this brutality.

Hamas' election victory

In the aftermath of the recent Hamas victory in the Palestinian election, it is too easy to simply label the outcome as the result of anti-Semitism. To do so would be to ignore many other factors that must be considered in determining a proper response to the election results. Those who voted for Hamas might have been motivated by a desire to end corruption in the Palestinian Authority or by Hamas' history of providing social assistance. But did even these factors justify a vote for Hamas? The answer must be: No. Even in the pursuit of legitimate self-interest, it was immoral to ignore the terrorist agenda and murderous policy of Hamas.

In Numbers 31:2, the nation of Moab was spared of the fate that met the nation of Midian for, while both attacked the Jewish People, only the latter was deemed to be motivated by hatred of Jews. The former was motivated by personal welfare. Nonetheless, Moab's attack upon the Jews also eventually met retribution, as personal interest still does not justify violence against the innocent. Perhaps the average Palestinian is not a violent anti-Semite and was motivated to support Hamas because he believed Hamas would truly help improve his life. But even in the pursuit of one's welfare, to ignore harm to others is also a form of evil that must be fought. But, as the Torah instructs, it can only be fought if properly identified and not subject to a blanket, one-dimensional perspective of anti-Semitism.

Programs need bricks and mortar

There have been a number of concerns expressed in the past weeks about UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and its ability to raise money for bricks and mortar – supposedly at the expense of providing programs ("Support for 'Jewish Singles World,'" letter, CJN, Jan. 5).

The Miles Nadal JCC was indeed "improved" by UJA's Tomorrow Campaign. Where we once had a decrepit building with declining enrolment, we now have the state-of-the-art Phil Granovsky Fitness Centre with 3,100 active members, the elegant Al Green Theatre, which is used for community and cultural events like the Toronto Jewish Film Society series, and bright, spacious classrooms that house the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School, the Downtown Jewish Community School and our own nursery school.

Bricks and mortar are the first step in providing opportunities for programs and outreach. The Miles Nadal JCC is at the crossroads of Spadina and Bloor, the historic Jewish heart of Toronto. UJA Federation enabled us to keep that heart beating, and now we have a building that is a source of pride for the Jewish community, and federation continues to fund our programs and activities. And the Jews – of all ages – are coming!

Indict Ahmadinejad in International Criminal Court

By RONY BLUM, GREGORY STANTON, ELIHU RICHTER AND ISRAEL CHARNY
Jerusalem Post

German Chancellor Angela Merkel was the first world leader to recognize the connection between Iran's uranium enrichment, its testing of long-distance missiles and the genocidal statements of its president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. A day after declaring that Israel "should be wiped off the map" on Oct. 25, 2005, he incited students to scream "Death to Israel," at a government-sponsored conference called "World without Zionism."

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

Merkel declared: "A president that questions Israel's right to exist [and] denies the Holocaust cannot expect to receive any tolerance from Germany. We have learned our history."

Will Merkel's warnings of the parallels between Iran's actions today and Nazi Germany's first steps towards genocide in the 1930s prod the world into effective deterrent action?

The International Association of Genocide Scholars (IAGS) has passed a resolution noting that Iran's actions, including Ahmadinejad's statements, are early warning signs of impending genocide. These signs include open expressions of an exclusionary ideology characterized by hate speech, an authoritarian government that represses dissent, the organization of fanatical militias such as the Revolutionary Guards, and a sustained record of support for terror attacks against Jews around the world.

Most recently, Ahmadinejad added to the list the denial of a past genocide – the Holocaust.

Indifference to incitement and inaction by the outside world, most notably the United Nations itself, are other warning signs – as we have seen in the Armenian genocide, the Holocaust, Bosnia, Kosovo, Rwanda, Darfur and elsewhere in the world.

The development of a covert nuclear weapons program and long-range missiles by a state whose leader declares genocidal intent states the case for urgent deterrent actions. As we address the Iranian threat, it is helpful to recall that genocide was the most deadly crime against humanity in the 20th century, resulting in some 250 million preventable deaths more than from all wars combined.

Historians have established that government incitement and use of hate language are recognized predictors, initiators, promoters and catalysts of genocide. The direct and public incitements to genocide by Iran's president are not only openly stated declarations of aggressive intent, but are in violation of Article 2 (4) of the UN charter; of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, adopted by Resolution 260 of the UN General Assembly in 1948; and of Articles 6 and 25 (3)(e) of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, which took effect in 2002.

Ahmadinejad's attempted "clarification" that he merely advocates the "transfer" of Jews in Israel to German and Austrian provinces is itself advocacy of forced deportation, another crime against humanity, and is contradicted by his own actions and long-term Iranian policy, including terror attacks on Jews outside Israel, such as the bombing of a synagogue in Buenos Aries.

Iran could soon be an independent nuclear power, possessing advanced missile delivery systems. Even before last Oct 25, Iran had never renounced its aggressive and genocidal aims against the Jews of the State of Israel and elsewhere.

The unprecedented threat of nuclear genocide necessitates an urgent response because, aside from the clear warning signs we have indicated, an actual apocalyptic nuclear attack could occur without further warning in time to engage in preventive action. Israel is a small country that can be reached within minutes by Iranian ballistic missiles. It is densely populated and home to the largest number of Holocaust survivors in the world. Time is of the essence and delay could be catastrophic.

The ethical principle that needs to guide international action to prevent all genocidal threats is that human life is the most fundamental human right, because without life there are no other human rights. The international obligation to protect human life and well-being overrides the sovereignty claims of any government whose actions demonstrate genocidal intent.

Because the dangers of inaction could be catastrophic, we repeat the calls of Genocide Watch, the Hebrew University Genocide and Violence Prevention Program's petition, and the International Association of Genocide Scholars for the application of the "precautionary principle," a powerful tool for decision-making in public health, for prevention of this and all other genocidal threats. This principle states that when there is uncertainty concerning the risk from a situation with potentially catastrophic effects upon human health and safety, the risks of inaction far outweigh those of preventive action.

The precautionary principle – which British Foreign Minister Jack Straw has already applied to this case – shifts the burden of proof from those warning of a risk of a catastrophic event to those denying this risk. Preventive action, of course, means the obligatory imposition of effective sanctions to prevent Iranian development of nuclear weapons, and includes immediate and continuous International Atomic Energy Agency inspections of all Iranian nuclear facilities, as well as confiscation of all technology, equipment and nuclear material that could be used by Iran to manufacture nuclear weapons.

Because the obligation to protect life and safety overrides state sovereignty, Iran's genocidal declarations and actions undermine its claims that it will responsibly utilize its nuclear material for peaceful means.

All this, however, is insufficient. Historians have recognized that genocide results from the conscious choices of elites and occurs when there is indifference of outsiders to early warning signs, particularly hate language that serves to catalyze genocidal actions.

Accordingly, we propose that the United Nations Security Council follow the landmark precedent of its referral of Sudanese leaders to the International Criminal Court (ICC), and refer Ahmadinejad to the ICC for indictment for incitement to commit genocide.

Those convicted for incitement to commit genocide by the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda and sentenced to prison terms up to life imprisonment included Rwanda's former prime minister, a historian, a newspaper editor, a minister of information, and a journalist. We insist that the specific perpetrator must be stopped, and reject economic sanctions, which would target the Iranian people collectively. Iran has a glorious past and culture, which this president definitely does not represent.

It is time for the United Nations to go from commemorating past genocides such as the Holocaust and Rwanda, to stopping current genocides such as those now raging in Darfur Sudan, and deterring and preventing future ones. We call upon Juan Mendez, special advisor to the secretary general of the UN on genocide prevention, to establish a genocide prevention network based on models for the surveillance of early warning signs of reportable epidemic disease.

Such a network should monitor the production and dissemination of all internationally distributed media and Internet hate language relating to threatened "world minority" populations, which include Israel and the global Jewish community.

Holocaust, genocide and hate group experts should set up this network.

The Stockholm International Forum on the Prevention of Genocide of Jan. 28, 2004, declared "the responsibility to protect groups identified as potential victims of genocide." We call upon the UN, the European Union, their member states and NGOs to exercise this responsibility by fostering the development and application of a code of ethics and standards for law, diplomacy, finance and the media that would outlaw incitement to hate, harm or exclusion of "world minority" communities, including the State of Israel, Israelis or Jews across the globe.

We suggest that indicting Ahmadinejad for incitement to commit genocide would send a clear, non-violent message to Iran's authoritarian leaders to back down from pursuing a genocidal ideology. It would be a major step towards deterring others planning future Bosnias, Kosovos, Rwandas and Darfurs. Chancellor Merkel has reminded us of the consequences of the world's ineffectual response to Hitler in the 1930s.

The world now has to choose between indifference and deterrence, not only to "save Israel," but to save itself.

For everything, a time

I am starved for time. Pressing matters appear out of nowhere to shred my schedule, and my "to do" list gets pushed to the next day, when it will most likely be neglected again.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Yes, I should learn something about time management. Indeed, there's no shortage of books on the subject. And there are "next generation" organizers (good organizers are never of this generation) that promise to make us more efficient and successful. These books and tools are great. But my own inefficient habits are not what truly confound me. Rather, I am perplexed by time itself.

How should I spend my time? At a certain point in life (middle age, to be exact), we begin to wonder more and more whether we are using our time wisely.

We have spent the previous 20 years driving ourselves harder and harder, using time as a highway to distant goals. Each time we reach a goal, we race headlong into another project, working again for future objectives. At times, when our work is challenging and satisfying, we can imagine racing down this highway forever.

I have doubts about this endless highway of ambition. Aren't we supposed to stop and smell the roses? Perhaps time is like a hot cup of tea, meant to be slowly savoured in Zen-like tranquility. Maybe the rat race is just a soul-stifling sideshow. It might be better to pull a Gauguin, and disappear into the South Pacific. So I am torn, with voices in mind my pushing and pulling, debating the relative merits of leisure and late-night work.

The voices in my mind (all former yeshiva students) quote Bible to me. The Sabbath is a day of rest, and sitting back and appreciating God's world is something holy. Yet, the Torah promotes an ambitious work ethic. The Book of Job says "man is created to work." Appreciation and ambition both make convincing arguments, and both are correct.

What time really demands is the ability to shift gears. One must be able to move between ambition and appreciation, depending on the situation. At times, you have to leave the fast-paced business world to spend time with family, and at times you have to pick up the pace and accomplish more. True time management is learning how to find time for both labour and leisure.

For those of us lost in time, it may be best to put aside our planners and consider some ancient advice. The Book of Ecclesiastes tells us "There is a time for everything, and a season for every activity under heaven." There is a time for smelling roses and a time for running races. The key is to accept the fact you have to do both.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Although the sequence of events that led to mounted police officers clubbing protesters, and injuring 200, remains unclear, it's clear that both sides behaved abominably.

The settlers and their supporters must take responsibility for a culture of lawlessness and treasonous rhetoric that threatened to explode during August's Gaza disengagement – and did not, thanks to both the settlers' and the security forces' exemplary restraint. Alas, it bore its poisonous fruit in Amona, though fortunately on a smaller scale.

Still, no matter how contemptible the protesters' violence was, Israel's security forces deserve more criticism. Israel's police and army, which do an admirable job daily, remain human institutions, meaning they are imperfect. But just as parents must exercise more self-control than their children, higher standards apply to the state and its agents than to protesters. Violence must be a last resort – after negotiations, after appealing to opinion leaders, after cutting off supplies. Better to wait it out than to smash people's heads – not because of the PR issues, but because of the moral ones.

The Amona episode particularly rankles, because it occurred as Israeli democracy was demonstrating remarkable maturity. The restraint both sides showed during the disengagement showed how individuals can disagree vehemently with the state, and how the state can stand firm, without violence erupting. More recently, the smooth governmental transition after Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's stroke illustrated Israel's democratic maturity. That all this occurred as the Palestinian Authority stumbled toward civil war – and as the Palestinians elected Hamas and many Muslims rioted against Europeans because of 12 cartoons that some Danes drew – highlighted once again Israel's moral stature amid Middle Eastern barbarism.

The pride the democratic West should take in Israeli democracy, however, should not obscure some snakes slithering in the democratic Eden. Israel should be embarrassed that too many former Gaza residents remain unsettled months after the disengagement. The Israeli left and Israeli government failed miserably on both pragmatic and moral grounds. Anyone hoping for further evacuations should have worked to ensure a seamless transition for all 8,500 Gaza evacuees. But just as too many on the Israeli left are too myopic to see the civil liberties issues when right-wingers' rights are trampled, too many Israeli leftists are so blinded by anti-settler hatred that they could not bear to embrace their fellow citizens, who paid a heavy price for the government's policy reversal.

At the same time, too many Israeli rightists are flirting with treason. It's time for rabbis to ban all inaccurate, hurtful, and disgusting pogrom and Nazi analogies when criticizing the modern sovereign Jewish state of Israel. Surely we can use other words to criticize a government without delighting the anti-Zionists who are busy Nazifying the Jewish state and the Holocaust deniers who wish to downgrade the Shoah from a unique catastrophe into a normal wartime event. It's time for settlers to stop praising themselves as the state's most idealistic, patriotic, exquisite citizens while tolerating a culture of hooliganism, disrespect and intermittent violence vis-a-vis that state, its leaders and its security forces.

When Muslims inflamed by the Muhammad cartoon controversy kidnap Europeans in Gaza, burn embassies in Beirut and demand beheadings in London, we love to lecture "them" about civility, democracy, mutuality and the need to accept others' differences, no matter how painful that might be. Perhaps it's time to start preaching that same sermon to Israel's extremists, on both sides, who put Israel's tremendous achievements at risk and have forgotten that the keys to civility include acknowledging complexity, humanizing opponents, and injecting a little humility, self-criticism, and self-control into our politics and our rhetoric.

The time has come to start crossing boundaries and stop trading insults. The time has come to seek social consensus and a debate with restraint and integrity, rather than seeking vindication and a discourse that demonizes fellow Jews.

London war museum offers lessons for Canada

A recent conference on survivors of Nazi persecution brought me to the British Imperial War Museum. Visiting the London museum for the first time, I found myself revisiting Canada's decision not to incorporate a Holocaust memorial into the Canadian War Museum in Ottawa. The London museum is a strong argument for the symbiosis of exhibitions.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

If, like me, you are not ordinarily drawn to museums of arms and armaments, you might overlook the Imperial War Museum. If so, you would be missing out on some of the most thought-provoking exhibitions in a museum-rich city.

Located south of the Thames, a short walk from such tourist meccas as the London Eye and the Tate Modern, the gracious old building that houses the Imperial War Museum gives little sign from the outside of the contemporary sensibility and technology that characterizes the best of its exhibitions. Focusing on the effect of modern warfare on people and society, the museum goes well beyond the array of weaponry that greets visitors in its entry hall. The extensive galleries on both world wars explore in detail the background, battles, causes and effects of these conflicts. The exhibits trace their global ramifications, and the conditions of battle for soldiers and civilians, giving a clear sense of the debates among historians about how we understand the wars and their political and social contexts.

The museum's permanent Holocaust exhibition occupies several storeys. It traces the persecution of the Jews under Nazism and the horrors of genocide, placing them in the context of European anti-Semitism. In addition to artifacts from the Holocaust, like Yad Vashem and the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., the Imperial War Museum's Holocaust exhibition also features videotaped survivor testimony and opportunities to learn more about particular events or issues.

Extensive enough to be a museum in its own right, the Holocaust exhibition is made even more meaningful by its place among the museum's other galleries. The World War II exhibit encompasses the rise of Nazism and genocide, and it points visitors to the Holocaust exhibition for greater depth. A small but powerful "Crimes against humanity" exhibition links witnessing the Holocaust and other genocides to social and political responsibility – to what we call tikkun olam, repairing the world.

During my visit, the Imperial War Museum housed a moving temporary exhibition on the experiences of children in Great Britain during World War II. Called "The Children's War," the exhibit explored the effects of war on British children who remained in cities during the Blitz, as well as British children who were evacuated and hence separated from their parents. Also included were the experiences of Jewish refugee children – the Kindertransport – sent without their parents from Austria, Germany, Poland and Czechoslovakia to the relative safety of Great Britain.

"The Children's War" placed the children of the Kindertransport in the context of other displaced and traumatized children in England, and, at the same time, made clear their special circumstances: Plunged into an unknown language and culture, never to return to their homes, most Kindertransport children never reunited with their parents, who were murdered in the Nazi genocide. The Holocaust exhibition picked up the thread, exploring the Kindertransport in greater detail, and setting it in the context of other Jewish children under Nazism.

Perusing these exhibitions, I could not help but recall the controversy that erupted several years ago over the proposal to incorporate a Holocaust memorial into the Canadian War Museum in Ottawa. At the time, many Canadian war veterans believed the museum was not the appropriate venue for a Holocaust exhibition, fearing that its presence would somehow detract from their own accomplishments and experiences.

It has not worked out that way in London. The various exhibitions at the Imperial War Museum, while distinct from one another and complete in and of themselves, are also integrated conceptually. Each one enhances the next, adding complexity and depth to the museum as a whole. Visitors initially attracted to one part of the museum find themselves drawn to other galleries. The net effect of such integration is not only to honour but to better understand the experiences of victims, survivors, and soldiers.

The Kirshner File

France makes amends for Vichy period

When the president of France, Georges Pompidou, was informed in 1969 that Marcel Ophuls' new documentary about the Vichy era, The Sorrow and the Pity, would shortly be broadcast on French state television, he practically had a fit. The ground-breaking, myth-shattering film was a rebuke – a challenge – to French nationalists such as Pompidou who fervently believed that the wartime Vichy government, administered by Marshall Philippe Pétain, was neither representative of France nor its revolutionary ideals.

Sheldon Kirshner in Paris

Far from buying into that rose-coloured version of events so favoured by the French political elite of the day, the movie minutely examined the shameful policies of a craven regime that collaborated with Germany, stripped Jewish citizens of their civic rights and property and worked hand in glove with the Gestapo to deport 25 per cent of Jews living in France. Ophuls, an American born in France, exploded the cherished myth that French men and women had joined the resistance movement in droves and had generally acted honourably during the four-year German occupation.

Pompidou, being aghast that Ophuls had reopened a file that he and many others had tried hard to forget and bury, banned The Sorrow and the Pity from the airwaves. "Pompidou's rationale was that the 'unity' of France was more important than regurgitating the past," explained Jean-Marc Dreyfus, a historian who specializes in that period.

But in banning The Sorrow and the Pity, Pompidou inadvertently reignited a festering debate. Since that sorry episode nearly four decades ago, Ophuls' whistle-blowing film has been screened on French TV and France has finally and belatedly come to terms with the legacy of the Pétain years. "But it was a long process," said Dreyfus, a 37-year-old professor at the Institute for Political Science whose PhD dissertation was on Vichy's confiscation of Jewish-owned banks.

This historical process has borne fruit, according to Henry Rousso, a scholar at the Institute of Contemporary History and the author of books and monographs on Vichy. As he put it in an interview, "The Holocaust has been a major issue in this country for the last 15 years."

France has passed through three major milestones in grappling with its responsibility for Vichy's crimes, said Rousso, part of whose family was deported to Auschwitz. France has paid restitution to many Holocaust survivors and their heirs and has brought major and minor war criminals to justice. And in a significant gesture of contrition in July 1995 to mark the 53rd anniversary of a French police roundup of Jews in and around Paris, President Jacques Chirac declared: "Yes, the criminal folly of the [Nazi] occupiers was assisted by the French people. These dark hours tarnish our history forever."

France began to examine its conscience after regaining its sovereignty in 1944. French resistance fighters and aggrieved individuals exacted revenge on collaborators, killing upward of 10,000 in a wave of vengeance, said Rousso. (In a replay of these events, an assassin killed Rene Bousquet, a former senior police official instrumental in the 1942 roundup of Jews in Paris, in 1993.) Pétain was sentenced to death, though his sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. Pierre Laval, the Vichy prime minister, was executed, as were about 2,000 others found guilty of treason. Among them were Jean Bassompierre, the inspector general of the Milice, which hunted down Jews and members of the resistance; Rene Beller, an agent of the German Secret State Police; and Robert Brassilach, the editor of the collaborationist periodical Je Suis Partout. "More people were executed in France than in Germany," noted Dreyfus.

All told, 300,000 French nationals were tried in the aftermath of the war. The accused included Louis Darquier de Pellepoix, the director of the Commissariat Général aux Questions Juives; Maurice Gabolde, the minister of justice from March 26, 1943, to Aug. 17, 1944; Jean Angeli, the regional prefect in Lyons; Pierre Boreo, a Milice official implicated in the 1944 murder of Georges Mandel, the former French minister of interior; and Yves Bouthiller, the finance minister from June 16, 1940, to April 18, 1942.

Toward the close of the '40s, as the Cold War intensified, the majority of the convicted criminals were released from prison and rehabilitated. In a word, the French wanted closure, Dreyfus said.

Several top-ranking Vichy officials managed to conceal their roles. One such person, Maurice Papon, signed deportation orders for 1,600 Jews from 1942 to '44 and enjoyed a civil service career in postwar France as chief of Paris police and budget minister in Valéry Giscard d'Estaing's government.

Apart from rescinding Vichy's corpus of anti-Jewish legislation, France returned much of the property Jews had lost during the war. "At least 90 per cent," said Dreyfus. "More than 50,000 claims were launched. It was, in general, a successful policy, a plan to reintegrate Jews into French society."

And in a conciliatory gesture, France opened its doors to Jewish Holocaust survivors from countries such as Poland and Romania.

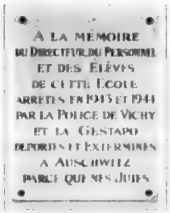
Jean-Marc Dreyfus, a historian who specializes in Vichy France

"By the mid-'50s, we did not speak a lot about the Holocaust," said Dreyfus. "It was repressed." Charles de Gaulle, the first president of the Fifth Republic, sought to reshape the past so that the glories of the French resistance movement would drown out the ignominy of Vichy France. "De Gaulle created a mythology," said Dreyfus. "World War II was described as an era of heroism. Collaboration was not spoken of."

Nevertheless, memories of the Holocaust bubbled under the surface in the '50s. Two of the winners of the nation's most prestigious literary award, the Prix Goncourt, Romain Gary and Andre Schwarz Bart, both wrote searing books about the Holocaust. Jean-Francois Steiner's graphic account of the Holocaust, Treblinka: The Revolt of an Extermination Camp, was published in the '60s. American historian Robert Paxton's explosive book, Vichy France: Old Guard and New Order, released in 1972, aroused interest in the Holocaust as well. Last year, the late Irene Nemirovsky's poignant memoir, Suite Française, a compelling portrait of France under the occupation, came out to great acclaim and made the bestsellers' list. An English edition will be published this year.



Holocaust plaque in Paris

The 1968 students' revolt, together with de Gaulle's resignation a few years later, stirred further debate over the Holocaust, as did the dedication of a memorial at the Drancy transit camp in 1976. Since then, a plethora of Holocaust monuments, from the Memorial to the Unknown Jewish Martyr to the Memorial to the Deported, both in Paris, have been built. Last month, a memorial in honour of murdered Jews was unveiled in Strasbourg. In the Marais, a traditionally Jewish neighbourhood in Paris, there are several plaques commemorating Holocaust victims.

To Dreyfus, one of the turning points in France's open acknowledgement of its complicity in the Holocaust occurred in 1978, when Serge Klarsfeld, a child survivor and Nazi hunter, mounted an exhibit in Paris on Vichy's treatment of Jews.

Bowing to U.S. pressure, the French government established the Matteoli Commission (1997) and the Dray Commission (2000), which have both rigorously re-examined the complicated, tangled issue of confiscated Jewish property. "The process of reimbursement is not finished," said Rousso. "There are survivors who have yet to be compensated." Recently, Charlotte Delahaye, 96, committed suicide in despair over not receiving proper compensation.

Researchers claim that the estimated value of looted Jewish property, including more than 100,000 works of art, is in the $4 billion (US) range. Dreyfus thinks that the figure has been inflated by 50 per cent. Survivors in the United States have launched a class action suit against SNCF, the state-owned French railway, for its role in transporting Jews to labour and extermination camps. Five years ago, a New York judge threw out a similar suit. Class action suits have also been filed against French banks – Crédit Lyonnais and Société Générale, to name but two – for not opening their wartime financial records.

One of the most important institutions in France dedicated to preserving Holocaust memory is the Foundation for the Memory of the Shoah, established in 1999. Headed by survivor and former cabinet minister Simone Veil, it was financed by a $342 million (US) grant from the unclaimed property of Jews who perished in the Holocaust.

In a series of high-profile trials since the late 1980s, France has prosecuted war criminals ranging from Paul Touvier, one of the leaders of the Milice, to Klaus Barbie, the head of the Gestapo in Lyons.

It is clear that France has made amends for the Vichy interregnum, but the Holocaust file has yet to be completely closed.

Jewish Life

A lesson in interfaith dialogue

By RABBI HOWARD MORRISON

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

The central portion of the Torah, and indeed of Jewish history, is this week's section called Yitro. In it, we read about the revelation by God to the People of Israel. The Decalogue, or Ten Commandments, concretizes the relationship between God and His people.

Strikingly, the blueprint of our tradition is found in a portion named after a non-Jewish Midianite priest, Yitro.

Who was Yitro? How does our tradition view him? What insight can he offer us today? Yitro's advice to Moses – to appoint brave, God-fearing and honest haters of corruption as judges to help him adjudicate disputes – paves the way for the next stage of Israelite history, standing at Mount Sinai. Yitro enables Moses to establish a structured form of leadership.

Perhaps most significantly, Yitro enters the scene immediately after we read about Amalek, a tribe that attacked the Israelites by surprise and from the rear in the Sinai Desert after the Israelites' exodus from Egypt. From the story of Amalek, which tells of Israel's first encounter with a non-Jew on leaving Egypt, one might have developed a negative perception of Jews interacting with non-Jews.

But the Torah's direct transition to Yitro teaches how a non-Jewish lover of Israel understands the mission of the Jewish people. Yitro is cognizant of the one God who redeemed Israel from Egypt. Yitro's blessing of God forms the basis for Psalm 117, part of the Hallel prayer, when the nations are commanded to praise God with the Israelites.

Today, Yitro's message offers us the hope for constructive dialogue with the non-Jewish community.

In Toronto, the Jewish-Christian Dialogue group continues to be an important meeting ground. The new forthcoming Mike and Sue Feldman Centre for Toronto Community Dialogue at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue will strive to further promote meaningful dialogue among religious, ethnic and cultural groups in the Toronto area. Already existing interfaith clergy councils should continue to meet, learn, grow and expand. The annual priest-rabbi study day sponsored by the Catholic Archdiocese of Toronto and the Toronto Board of Rabbis provides a forum for clergy to learn about our similarities and differences.

Thank God for a Torah portion called Yitro. Only with dialogue and co-operation between Jews and our non-Jewish neighbours can we fully live up to our ideal of being a "light unto the nations."

Chabad starts shul in downtown Vancouver

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — Chabad Lubavitch of British Columbia has started regular Shabbat services at its new synagogue in downtown Vancouver, the first such minyan in the city's core in recent memory.

Chabad's Rabbi Binyomin Bitton said inaugural Shabbat services, which took place at the end of December at the B'nai Brith Manor senior citizens residence on Howe Street, attracted between 15 and 20 participants, mostly from outside the building.

The goal is to one day have a building for the new synagogue. "God willing, we are anticipating outgrowing [B'nai Brith Manor]," Rabbi Bitton said.

The new shul, which the rabbi said will have a name "some time in the near future," is the second Chabad initiative launched recently in downtown Vancouver.

Last July, Chabad opened a downtown centre in the Yaletown home of Rabbi Bitton, his wife Malky and their two young children. It offers a number of programs, including once-a-month Friday evening Shabbaton programs hosted by the Bittons in their home.

The programs, which comprise an erev Shabbat service and dinner, have been attracting 30 people each month.

"Thirty is the most we can accommodate in our home, although many more people would like to attend," Rabbi Bitton said, adding that because of the demand, it's necessary to phone and reserve a seat at the table in advance.

Other programs include Rabbi Bitton's Monday-night Kabbalah class and his noon-hour "lunch and learn" class for businesspeople on Wednesdays.

His wife teaches a Wednesday-night class for women. "The classes are based on the weekly Torah portion and they're geared to women," Malky Bitton said.

Attendance is growing steadily: There are now half a dozen regular participants, she said.

Chabad's Chanukah celebrations, co-sponsored by the Vancouver Downtown Jewish Community, a cultural outreach group, took place at the Stanley Park Pavilion and attracted 150 people.

Teams of yeshiva students visit Jewish businesses on Friday mornings to spread Judaism

"Chanukah was packed," Rabbi Bitton said. "Far more people showed up than we expected."

As well, Chabad's High Holy Day services last fall attracted some 100 people, he said.

Chabad's downtown centre has also started a "mivtzaim campaign," in which teams of yeshivah students visit Jewish businesses on Friday mornings in order to spread Judaism. They do such things as put mezuzahs on the doors of Jewish businesses and encourage businessmen to put on tfillin in the morning.

Chabad's downtown centre also has a weekly publication, The Wellspring, that it distributes by mail and e-mail.

Rabbi Bitton, who hails from Lyon, France, met Vancouverite Malky Huberman while studying in New York. They married, and, after Rabbi Bitton completed his studies in 2004, the couple moved to Vancouver.

They have two children: a daughter, Sarale, two, and a son, Mendel, one.

Their home, which doubles as the Chabad centre, is on Homer Street in an area that was formerly an untidy warren of light industry, train yards and warehouses but has become an upscale urban neighbourhood of highrises, exposed-brick residential lofts and pricey restaurants.

Rabbi Bitton said Chabad's downtown programs and facilities fill a religious need.

"There was nothing downtown until we opened," he said. "There are at least two or three thousand Jews living downtown. Most have moved into the area in just the last couple of years. As well, many Jews work downtown. Plus there are always Jewish tourists and visitors passing through Vancouver all the time."

Malky Bitton, who grew up near the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver in the Oakridge section of Vancouver, said running the downtown centre is exciting and challenging.

"Spreading Judaism is what I always wanted to do," she said. "But we're starting from scratch, and it's a lot of hard work."

Chabad's downtown centre is its fourth in the Vancouver area. In addition to the main one at 41st Avenue and Oak Street in Vancouver, there are also centres in the suburbs of Richmond and Surrey. Chabad has a centre in Victoria as well.

For more information, contact Rabbi Bitton at rabbi@chabadcitycentre.com or at 778-371-9508.

Jewish Life

The power of one word

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

As we read the Torah portion containing the Ten Commandments, the legal foundation of a Jewish society starts to establish itself. It is a world that legislates ritual practice as well as social and family laws.

We are commanded not to replace God with idolatrous images. We are commanded not to depict God in physical representations. We are commanded not to murder and not to engage in adultery, nor to steal or lie during testimony. The list continues, and we have volumes and volumes of Jewish texts that analyze and present and philosophize on Jewish identity, history and expression as it begins to manifest itself in the Ten Commandments.

What we do not dwell upon as perhaps we should is the very first word communicated by God to Israel at Sinai. The very beginning of the Ten Commandments is the profound statement: "I am."

One of the first challenges of this text is to read through the list of commandments and conclude with a count of 10. Depending on how one punctuates the sentences, the minimum count would probably hover around 20 and could reach to somewhere in the 30s. It's understandable why so much of Jewish interpretational literature must pay close attention to how we read this text, since nothing is to be assumed. Yet, we so easily glide over the first commandment, which is not a prohibition of behaviour, but an acceptance of self-affirmation: "I am."

God's first direct word to Israel as a nation is the personal declaration that states what God is: God is existence itself. But from there, God continues to describe a relationship: "I am the Lord, your God" – I am personally connected to you. And proceeding onward, the commandment concludes: "who brought you out of Egypt," – I am the God who redeems you.

The midrash describes the force of this one word, the Hebrew "anochi," "I am," as so powerful and overwhelming that Israel is not able to withstand its force or its reality. According to the midrash in Song of Songs Rabbah, all of Israel dies at the moment that the full realization of "I am" hits them. At that moment, the angels begin to hug each person, kiss them and gently comfort them with words of assurance.

"Do not fear," say the angels. "Are you not God's children?"

At the same time, God is softly repeating, "I am" to us, gently coaxing our souls back to life.

With the power of the statement of Divine being, the Ten Commandments clearly lay the foundation for law and order, family infrastructure and spiritual expression.

At the same time, one must not take lightly that God's declaration of being can be so powerful that we cannot sustain it, and yet it is simultaneously so gentle and reassuring that we cannot resist.

Jewish wedding music

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

A beautiful floral arrangement is certainly important. And, of course, delicious food is a must. But what would a Jewish wedding be without music? From horah to klezmer, chassidic to Israeli, music adds extra joy and life to an already festive occasion. If you are lucky enough to be planning a wedding right now (or are nostalgic about your own) you can find some wonderful ideas and tunes on the web. Today, I'll tell you where to look.

The tour starts in London at the website of the BBC, which has put together a lovely web page titled World on Your Street. It looks at the importance music plays at Jewish weddings. Click the link at the top of the page for a lively rendition of the venerable wedding standard Havah Nagilah, by the Budapester Klezmer Band. Once you're done, go to the bottom of the page and click on the link for a feature on Danny Shine, leader of one of the United Kingdom's busiest Jewish wedding bands. Listen to a documentary about Jewish wedding music and then watch Shine at work. [http://tinyurl.com/82e3g]

One of the highlights of a Jewish wedding ceremony is the singing of the Sheva Brachot, the blessings during which the chatan and kallah are wished "gila, rina, ditza v'chedva, ahava v'achva, v'shalom v'reut," rejoicing, jubilation, pleasure and delight, love and brotherhood, peace and friendship. If you are going to be honoured with reciting one of the blessings under the chupah, here is a site where you can listen to two sets of instrumental melodies and find the brachot in Hebrew, in English, and in English transliteration. [http://tinyurl.com/dcumu] If you'd like to hear the brachot being sung, then take a listen to a performance by Josh Sharfman, aka the Virtual Cantor. [www.virtualcantor.com/weddings.htm]

The Chazzanut.com website has provided sheet music for the Sheva Brachot as sung by Chazzan Hans Bloemendal. According to the site, the fifth blessing, Samei'ach Tesamach, is set to a tune from Mozart's Die Zauberflöte! [www.chazzanut.com/wedding/] For more sheet music, you can download a zip file of the works of Rev. Marcus Hast (1840-1911) from the Great Synagogue, London, 1910. [http://tinyurl.com/8x28p]

The best sampling of wedding music that I've come across can be found on a site called WedAlert. These are not full renditions but the first minute or so of classics such as Erev shel Shoshanim, Dodi Li, Siman Tov, Bei Mir Bist Du Schoen and a large helping of Fiddler on the Roof (To Life, If I Were a Rich Man, Sunrise Sunset.) Sure they can be a bit schmaltzy and you've probably heard them all a million times but if you hadn't, they wouldn't be classics. [www.wedalert.com/songs/ethnic/jewish.asp]

If you're looking for something less familiar, visit the wedding section of the Zemer! website. You can listen to renditions of about a dozen Yiddish, Hebrew and Bukharian songs and read the lyrics and translations of about 20 others. [http://tinyurl.com/7wfab] The lovely Ladino folksong, Scalerica D'oro, tells this tale:

A ladder of gold and ivory
So our little bride can go up to take
Her marriage vows
We've come to see, we've come to see
May they have joy and prosper
And always be happy
The bride has no money
May they have good fortune
The bride has no riches
May they have good luck.

A couple of sites offer short excerpts from commercial CDs including The Travelling Jewish Wedding [http://tinyurl.com/9scqw] and several at JewishMusic.com. [http://tinyurl.com/am5nf]

The name of the next site doesn't exactly roll off the tongue: the Israeli Jewish Yiddish Hebrew Folk Cultural Music Midi Free Library. Luckily, the site's address is much shorter. [www.jewz.net/] The library has simple instrumental arrangements of about 150 classics, some of which may be perfect for your wedding (Bashana Haba'ah, Havah Nagila, Yerushalayim Shel Zahav); others, perhaps not (Go Down Moses, Hatikvah, Theme from Seinfeld.)

Diameter of the Bomb

Diameter of the Bomb is a powerful documentary about a suicide bomb that shook Jerusalem one summer morning in June 2002. Part-thriller, part-mystery it follows Israeli police, secret service and military as they try to prevent the attack and mercilessly track down the terrorist cell behind it. We watch as friends and relatives struggle to piece together fragments of their lives and loved ones.

Hamas' extremism is there for all to see

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Hamas' victory in last month's Palestinian election was the focus of CBC Radio's Sunday Edition (Feb. 5). Two guests interviewed separately by host Michael Enright presented vastly different visions of future Palestinian-Israeli relations.

Indeed, they inhabit different universes.

Israeli writer and peace activist Amos Oz represented what has now become the majority view in Israel: that the only solution to the conflict is the two-state model, as envisioned in the internationally backed "road map" peace plan.

Palestinian professor Azzam Tamimi, director of the Institute of Islamic Political Thought in London, England, represented the antithesis of compromise. A strong supporter of Hamas, Tamimi has advocated for the elimination of Israel, although he claims, contrary to the Hamas covenant, not to support the murder of Jews.

Enright began by asking Oz about the impact of Hamas' election victory. Oz described it as "a disaster for Palestine, for Israel and for the entire Middle East."

Regarding reports that Hamas is prepared to offer a long-term truce if Israel returns to the pre-1967 borders, Oz said: "It's like saying to the Israelis, 'I'm going to destroy Israel not in one phase but in two phases.' I don't think even the doves in Israel are likely to buy this one."

In contrast, Tamimi's extremism – the type of fanaticism Enright and Oz spent much time discussing – was apparent.

Tamimi said that "the only real chance for peace is with Hamas." But when Enright asked for a clarification, Tamimi added: "I mean, the offer of a truce by Hamas to the Israelis.You see, the Palestinians can never recognize the theft of their land. Their land was stolen from them in order to create the State of Israel. Hamas can never recognize the legitimacy of [Israel's] existence."

Enright responded: "I don't think it's the recognition that's the question. I think it's what flows from that, and that is the avowed purpose of eradicating the State of Israel. Whether it's recognized or not, is it still the view of Hamas that Israel cannot any longer exist?"

Tamimi replied: "What we're saying [is that] Palestine is ours. One day we'll have it all back, but we agree that for the time being we are going to sign a ceasefire agreement."

Echoing Oz's comment on the promise of a ceasefire, Enright said: "It's the 'one day' part that bothers a lot of people. People are saying that a ceasefire is really only an agreement by Hamas that it will take two or three steps to destroy the State of Israel."

While Tamimi tried to sound as reasonable as possible for the Canadian audience, Enright managed to get him to discuss Hamas' extremist platform, including its anti-Semitic charter. Tamimi conceded the charter needed partial amendment, but not the section calling for Israel's obliteration.

Tamimi's extremist views have long been apparent, and he's expressed them in other media interviews.

Back on Nov. 11, 2001 – a mere two months after the horrific events of Sept. 11 – Tamimi told the Spanish daily La Vanguardia: "I admire the Taliban, they are courageous."

On the BBC TV show Hard Talk (Nov. 2, 2004), host Tim Sebastian challenged Tamimi about a statement he made the previous year: "For us Muslims, martyrdom is not the end of things but the beginning of the most wonderful of things."

"If it's so wonderful to go and blow yourself up in a public place in Israel," Sebastian asked, "why don't you do it?"

After some evasions, Tamimi finally said: "If I have the opportunity, I would do it… If I can go to Palestine and sacrifice myself, I would do it. Why not?"

CJC wants Mideast book pulled from school shelves

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

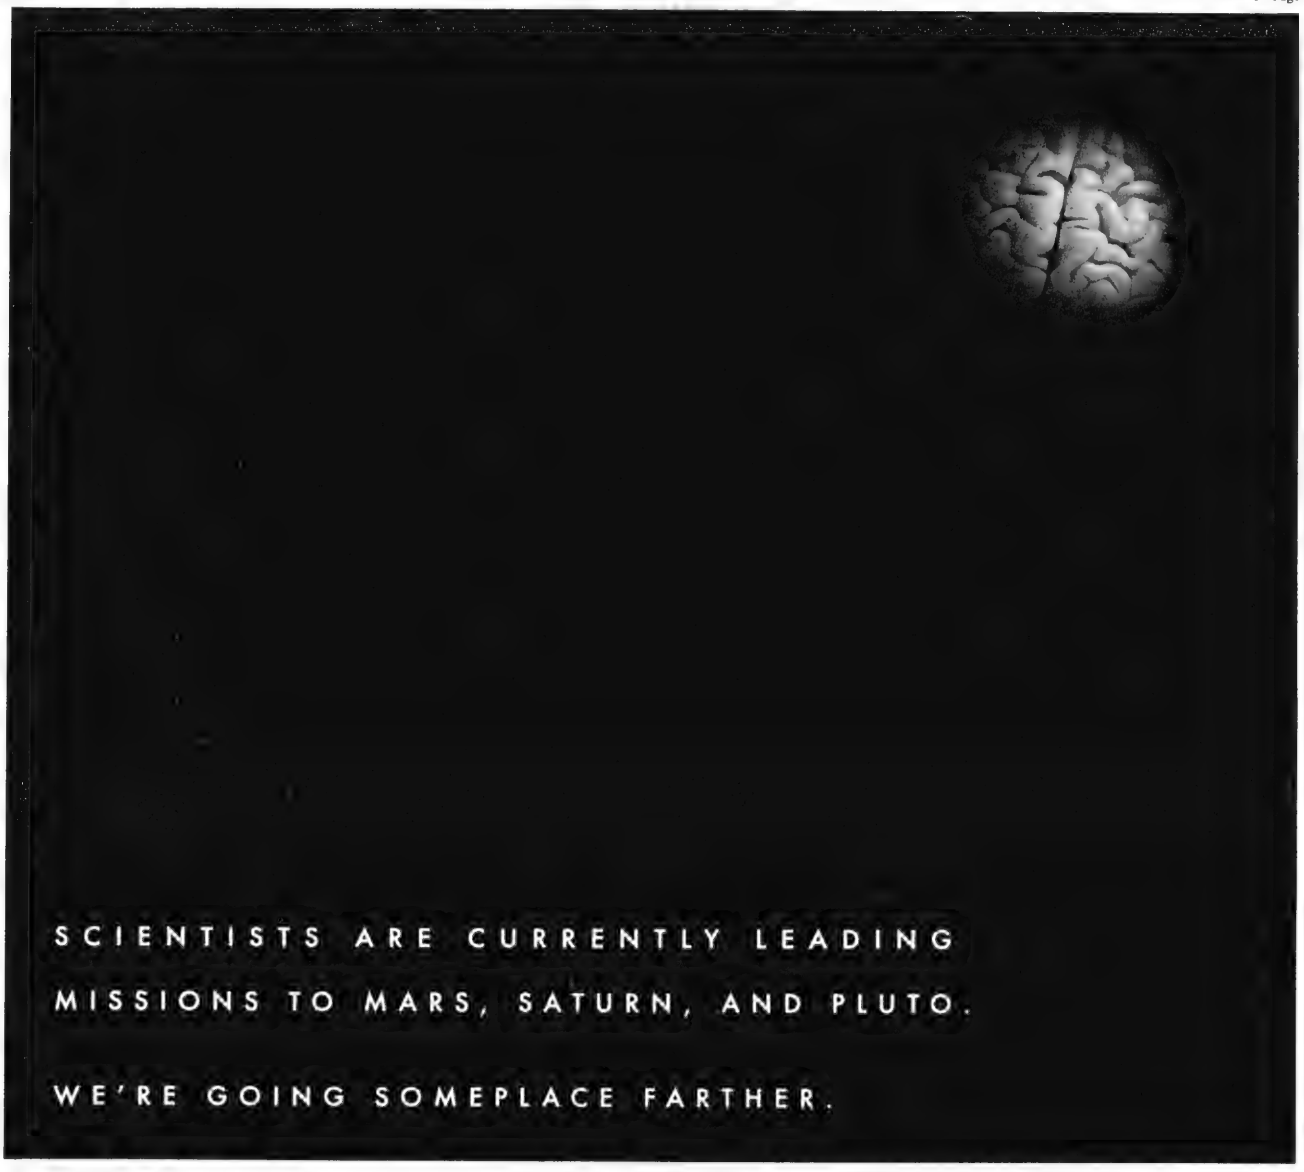
Canadian Jewish Congress is asking the Ontario Library Association (OLA) and 60 school boards across the province to remove a controversial children's book from the OLA's prestigious Silver Birch Awards reading program.

The book, Three Wishes, Palestinian and Israeli Children Speak, "is not appropriate for children in grades 4 to 6," states Frank Bialystok, chair of Congress' community relations committee in Ontario.

In a letter to OLA executive director Larry Moore, Bialystok contends the book paints the Israelis as "brutal occupiers, intent on indiscriminate acts of humiliation and killing, who deserve to be killed in return; [and] the Palestinians are murderers who are so intent on killing Israelis that they are prepared to blow themselves to shreds in order to achieve their goal. Most dangerous, though, is the notion that suicide bombing represents a credible choice and may be worthy of emulation."

Moore said the OLA will "honour the selection committee, who feel quite comfortable about their decision."

He said committee members – more than 30 librarians from across the province – have reviewed their decision in light of complaints and "they stand by their feelings about the book." He said the OLA board is satisfied the selection committee followed proper procedures in making its choice.



There are, to the best of our knowledge, no rockets being launched at Baycrest. But the mission that our scientists and researchers are leading is carrying more hope and promise for humanity than any spacecraft navigating any universe. Ours is a journey to unlock and understand the last, great mystery of human life, the brain.

Our unique exploration of aging and brain function has compelled researchers from Berkeley, University College London and throughout the scientific community to work with Baycrest in charting the course of neuroscientific research. Our staff has made vital contributions to the US National Institutes of Health's Human Brain Project and Neuroinformatics Technology Initiative, efforts that parallel the Human Genome Project in scope. Our explorations have revealed the potential for nutritional, lifestyle, and psychological factors to impact brain function, allowing us to develop ways of improving the memory, cognitive functions, and quality of life in the elderly and brain-damaged people. And in our landmark brain imaging work, we have discovered that the networks that control the brain reorganize themselves throughout life, offering new hope for people living with Alzheimer's disease and the effects of stroke.

There is, however, another goal that drives all that Baycrest does: every quest we undertake is led with one eye on the science and the other on its translation into the care, restoration, and celebration of humanity. At the end of our great mission waits not fame, nor history, but the very mind of man. Each day, that destination looms larger in our eyes.

Greater Toronto Area

Project will help develop communities for former settlers

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

Rachel Yechieli weeps when she recalls the "perfect life" she used to have in the former settlement of Katif in the Gaza Strip.

Cut off from her friends and family, the 18-year-old now lives in a tiny apartment in Sede Yakov in northern Israel, where she shares a bedroom with her seven brothers and sisters.

"We don't have space to breathe. I live without my community, without my friends," Yechieli said in an interview while in Toronto recently. "In one week everything changed and our whole life was destroyed."

It's a reality Dr. Temira Feinsilver, who used to live in the Gaza settlement of Netzarim, knows all too well. Relocated to a temporary camp in Yivul, she has seen a dramatic spike in the number of social problems afflicting those in her community.

"As a doctor I see many people with after-effects like depression and drugs," she said. "This comes from a community that was very healthy."

While the political costs of the disengagement from the Gaza Strip remain a hot-button issue, the social fallout and story of displaced former settlers trying to rebuild their lives has slipped from the public's view.

That's why UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, spurred in part by World Mizrachi chair and Toronto philanthropist Kurt Rothschild, has created the Netzarim Fund, which will aid in the development of two new communities in Israel, Netzarim and Katif. Both will be located within the Green Line, Israel's pre-1967 border, and will absorb the settlers from their temporary homes.

Yechieli and Feinsilver were in Toronto recently as part of a mission to raise awareness about the adverse conditions being faced by former Gaza Strip settlers in the wake of last summer's disengagement.

Speaking at an event hosted by Linda Frum and husband Howard Sokolowski, Yechieli said most members from her former community of Katif are living in a hotel in the southern city of Ashkelon. "We used to be so strong, so full of energy. We were so together, and now we're all broken," she said.

Some continue to pay mortgages on homes that no longer exist

Many Gaza settlers have yet to receive compensation from the government, and some, like Feinsilver, continue to pay mortgages on homes that no longer exist.

In an interview, Cobie Brosh, Israel's consul general in Toronto, said the Israeli government is working to ensure the settlers receive funds. "They all have received or will receive compensation," he said.

Brosh explained that a disengagement authority was established to handle the civilian side of the disengagement one year before the pullout from Gaza. The settlers were advised to approach the authority in order to take care of all their personal issues, including the "amount they deserved to get and arrangements for themselves and their families."

Brosh said "there were quite a number that didn't approach the authority and many of them didn't pack their houses because to the last moment they didn't believe this would take place. They should have taken the measures they were recommended to take but instead many didn't, or waited until the last minute."

And bureaucratic regulations make compensating the settlers time-consuming, Brosh acknowledged. "Regrettably, the process is taking time. But they will be compensated," he stressed. "No one will be left without getting what she or he deserves to get."

He also noted that the government has offered to cover costs for those settlers who are living in hotels or temporary homes.

Feinsilver, however, says she pays $450 (US) a month for the two-bedroom, one-bathroom mobile home she now shares with her husband and five children.

The construction of new communities such as Netzarim and Katif provide hope to former settlers like Feinsilver and Yechieli. "We believe that settling the Negev and continuing to live as we lived in Gaza, that's the answer and that's what we need to do," said Feinsilver. There are hopes the new communities will prosper the way the former Gaza settlements did.

Netzarim is being established in the Halutza sands region of Israel; which is located in the southwestern Negev, while Katif will be located in the Lachish region, near Be'er Sheva. Netzarim will be one of four townships built in the Halutza sands area, and there will also be other townships near Katif in the Lachish area.

While homes and infrastructure such as roads will be covered by funds provided by the Israeli government, the Netzarim Project will assist with everything that isn't covered by the government's budget, such as the construction of community centres and educational institutions.

Rothschild described the new townships and the former settlers who will live there as "constructive and forward-looking."

"In spite of all their hardships, they are looking into the future and want to rebuild for the sake of the State of Israel in the Negev and in other areas what was lost," he said.

Speaking about the high rate of unemployment among the former Gaza settlers, Rothschild said "about 70 to 80 per cent of people who were farmers, educators and workers and government employees in the Gush Katif area are unemployed." He added that an effort is being made to retrain some of them and help them find employment.

In an interview, Rothschild said that "when the disengagement took place, many settlers were put in hotels or temporary quarters or in caravans or trailers that were being prepared or being built," adding that some were moved into tents.

However, this is gradually being addressed, he said.

Moderate Muslim speaks out

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Nonie Darwish remembers growing up and hearing Jews referred to as dogs. She also recalls being told, "Don't take candy from Jews. It could be poison."

In a lecture called "My Story: Growing up in a Jihadist Culture," Darwish gave first-hand insight into the state of hatred, terror and paranoia in the Arab world. It was the second of 10 talks that were part of the Know Radical Islam conference, which took place last week at the University of Toronto.

The event was planned by Betar-Tagar and the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center to counter the Arab Students' Collective's Israeli Apartheid Week, running this week at U of T.

Darwish explained that young Muslims are being taught the vilest forms of hatred. Textbooks in the Palestinian Authority openly encourage anti-Semitism, and more than 300 schools are named after terrorists, Darwish said.

"We must take our children away from the destiny of destruction," she said. "It's not the fault of the West. It's because of us [Muslims]. Muslim mothers are silent."

Darwish, a mother of three, was born in Cairo, and raised there and in Gaza Strip. She immigrated to the United States in 1978. She said the radical Islamic way is to "love death like our enemies love life," and they won't compromise.

The culmination of this cradle-to-grave indoctrination is the election of Hamas in the Palestinian Authority, she said. "Osama bin Laden would win elections in Saudi Arabia if there were elections there."

The Sept. 11 terrorist attacks were a major turning point for her, and led her to begin speaking out against terror and the culture that produces it.

In 2004, she founded www.ArabsforIsrael.com, a website of moderate Muslim dialogue. She has worked as an editor and translator and is now a freelance writer.

She said the Danish cartoon fiasco, and the response to it, is no surprise.

Muslims urged the world after 9/11 to not judge Islam by the acts of 19 terrorists, she said. "But how come they judge the whole West by one cartoon?"

The hatred is so strong that radical Muslims want to kill non-Muslims, she added.

"There are powerful forces in our culture working against peace," she said, noting that radical Muslim clerics are free to preach violence and terror.

"Instead of being a source of comfort and wisdom, they have been a source of hate, rape, anger and paranoia. Terrorism does not happen by accident. It is a direct result of the worship of jihad."

Islamic terrorism occurred before the Six Day War in 1967 and before any occupation, she said.

"We must be honest with ourselves and end the blame game. Israel is the scapegoat. Arab leaders point fingers instead of building hospitals, roads, jobs."

With 22 countries, Muslims, she said "don't have a shortage of land," but "a shortage of freedom."

Darwish said that, "Every day I am grateful for the goodwill of Israel," noting that her brother was saved from death in 1995 at Jerusalem's Hadassah Hospital after suffering a stroke in Gaza.

"I can support Israel and still support the Arab world."

The Know Radical Islam event aimed to highlight the growth of Islamic extremism, one of its organizers said.

"We want to expose oppression, persecution, and the trampling of women's rights. Ignoring radical Islam isn't the way to make it go away," said Jonathan Jaffit, 21, a U of T biology and Jewish history student, and a member of Betar-Tagar.

Moral clarity, he said, only develops from open dialogue.

Zionist conference held in Miami

By JONAH BROTMAN
Special to The CJN

About 80 Jewish university and college students across North America gathered last month in Miami to learn about Israel activism and address the issue of clashes on campuses between Israeli and Palestinian students.

The Young Zionist Leadership Conference, which ran from Jan. 27 to 29, was organized and sponsored by USD/Hagshama, the World Zionist Organization and the Jewish Agency.

The conference's aim was to arm students with tools to intelligently defend Israel on their campuses. It included lectures by Israeli diplomats and student-run sessions dealing with bias in campus media. The keynote speaker, Yonatan Geffen, father of Israeli rock star Aviv Geffen, delighted the audience with personal anecdotes and poems from a generation past.

"The conference was very effective in terms of brainstorming and in reaching the conclusion that we wanted to steer away from the confrontational tactics that have plagued campuses recently," says Assaf Weisz, a York University student.

The Canadian contingent at the conference, representing the University of British Columbia, York University, McGill University, the University of Guelph and Carleton University, was also concerned about on-campus confrontations between Palestinian and Israeli students.

"Being [from] a small town, you get lots of people that either don't know anything about Israel and the conflict or they think Israel is always wrong and they try to prove it to you," says Michael Unea, a third-year student from Guelph.

"It can be intimidating so this conference definitely helped me in that way."

For others, the experience was also a break from the grind of the Canadian winter and the winter school semester.

"The conference taught me new ways to handle real situations that arise on my campus in terms of the Israeli-Palestinian debate. But then again, the sunny weather and the beaches of Miami were pretty fun, too," says Michael Nilevsky, another Guelph participant.

CHOCOLATE CHIP CRACKS

The chocolate dough is formed into balls and rolled in confectioners' sugar just before baking. As the cookies bake, they fracture and open randomly, and the casual splits form contrasting patches of dark dough and light sugar.

1½ cups bleached all-purpose flour
1 tbsp. unsweetened alkalized cocoa powder
1½ tsp. baking powder
½ tsp. salt
6 tbsp. vegetable oil (such as canola)
1½ cups granulated sugar
3 oz. unsweetened chocolate, melted and cooled
2 tsp. vanilla extract
3 large eggs
1 cup miniature semisweet chocolate chips about 2 cups confectioners' sugar for coating

Sift the flour, sugar, cocoa powder, baking powder and salt onto a sheet of waxed paper.

Mix the oil, melted chocolate, vanilla extract and eggs in the large bowl of a free-standing electric mixer on moderately low speed for 2 to 3 minutes, or until well-blended. On low speed, add the flour mixture in 2 additions, beating until the particles of flour are absorbed. Scrape down the sides of the mixing bowl frequently to keep the mixture even-textured. Blend in the chocolate chips. At this point, the mixture will resemble a thick batter more than a firm or dense cookie dough.

Cover the bowl of dough and refrigerate for 6 to 8 hours, or until firm enough to handle (it stores nicely in the refrigerator overnight).

Preheat the oven to 350. Line several cookie sheets or rimmed sheet pans with cooking parchment paper. Have the confectioners' sugar at hand in a shallow bowl. Take up rounded 2-tbsp.-size mounds of dough and roll into balls. Roll the balls in the confectioners' sugar to coat well. Place the balls of dough on the prepared pans, spacing them 2½ inches apart.

Bake the cookies in the preheated oven for 12 to 14 minutes, or until set. The insides should remain moist and somewhat fudgy. Let the cookies stand on the pans for 2 minutes, then transfer them to cooling racks, using a wide offset metal spatula. Store in an airtight tin. Makes about 2½ dozen cookies. Bake and serve within 2 days.

Hard work and schnapps key to long life: 95-year-old

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

If there is one man whose many virtues encapsulate what a quintessential zaide is, then it may very well be Itsy Norris.

"He makes everybody laugh and feel good about themselves."

The great-grandfather of 18 turns 95 on Feb.19, and nearly the entire family and a legion of friends will celebrate the occasion in Florida, where Norris spends the winter months.

Close to 100 people are expected to join in the festivities, and the predictions are that Norris will be the first one on and last one off the dance floor.

"We just had my daughter's bat mitzvah and we couldn't get him off the floor," says grandson Jeff Alter, beaming.

A fixture of Kitchener's small, tight-knit Jewish community in southwestern Ontario, Norris is in shul most Shabbats at Beth Jacob Synagogue, where he held the post of head gabbai until recently.

He landed in Kitchener as a 13-year-old immigrant from Poland, and as was common in those days, needed to work from an early age.

At 15, he became a peddler, travelling from town to town with a cart full of scraps to buy and sell.

"My grandfather never worked in the office," Alter says.

"Even up until he retired, he continued to work outside in the yard, separating and cutting the metals."

Many people attribute Norris' longevity in part to his hard work.

"I bet you the manual labour has something to do with it," notes Moscoe, adding that a positive outlook has also been key.

To that end, Norris hasn't let potentially devastating life events set him back, including the loss of two children and his wife.

"He's so happy, it's unbelievable," says Moscoe.

"There are certain people who are like that, able to look at the bright side of life."

In addition to his legendary work ethic and optimism, Norris also has a reputation for fun and adventure.

At 16, rather than allow a relative to arrange his marriage, Norris secretly wed the love of his life, Lillian, with whom he had four children.

And still to this day, the consummate zaide has a ritual shot of liquor each day.

"He tells me that he lives so long because of the hard work and schnapps every day," Alter says.

Norris relishes spending time with people, particularly family.

"He doesn't just know his great-grandchildren by name – he knows these kids and has a different relationship with every one of them," Alter says.

Alter and Moscoe note there are many lessons to be learned from their zaide, but the most valuable one, they agree, is to have a genuine zest for life.

"He has always treated and thought of life as a wonderful blessing and he reminds all of us of this," Alter says.

Obituary

Leonard Kitz, Halifax's first Jewish mayor

BY JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Leonard Kitz, the first-ever Jewish mayor of Halifax, died Jan. 30 of heart failure at age 89.

In 1948, at a time when Jewish citizens of Halifax were barred from many social and athletic clubs, Kitz ran for election as a city alderman and won, serving for seven years.

In 1955, he ran for mayor and also won, becoming the city's first-ever Jewish mayor.

After serving in the Canadian Army in Europe in World War II, he had returned home with the aim of altering the thinking in his hometown.

At the time, Halifax was generally divided along Catholic and Protestant lines, and mayors of each religion alternated for one-year terms. Schools and their governing chairmen were also divided along religious lines. The phenomenon even extended to the appointment of city staff: if the fire chief was Catholic, the police chief had to be Protestant. Jews were grouped with the Protestants.

In 1955, when it was time for a Protestant mayor, Kitz threw his hat in the ring. He won, convincingly. During his term, in 1956, the province enacted legislation that extended the term of office for mayor to three years.

Kitz ran again and won.

His wins broke the Catholic-Protestant succession order and signalled that the days of segregated religious hospitals, schools and universities in Halifax would soon be over.

"He was proud of his religion. Proud to be a Haligonian and a Canadian," said his wife Janet, whom Kitz married in 1971, two years after the death of his first wife, Alice.

"He couldn't take any activity lightly. He went into things with intensity. He told me being the first Jewish mayor [of Halifax] wasn't as important to him as being a good mayor."

She said Kitz had interest in, and time for, people of all races, religions and colours.

"He wasn't insular. He wasn't limited to one small fraction of society. During the recent mourning period, I received cards, letters, e-mails, phone calls and visits from people of all races and from around the world."

During Kitz's term as mayor, Halifax instituted new management rules, including the hiring of professional managers, and undertook a major renovation of the council chamber.

Kitz was born in Halifax in 1916 and earned a law degree at Dalhousie University in 1938. He became an infantry officer, then a captain, with the Princess Louise Fusiliers during World War II, serving in Italy and Holland.

In 1945, he married Alice Duff Findlay, a doctor from Aberdeen who was serving with the British Army. They settled in Halifax after the war, and he opened a small law practice while carrying on his father's real estate company. He built the law firm into one of the largest in Halifax and eventually merged it with other Atlantic Canadian firms.

In 1958, Kitz, a staunch Liberal, decided not to run again for mayor. Instead, he ran for Parliament, but was defeated in the John Diefenbaker-led Conservative sweep. That ended his political career, but it didn't stop him from being involved in the community.

He was a founder of the Halifax Grammar School, a private school, and served as vice-president of its board of directors. He also sat on a number of other boards, including the Technical University of Nova Scotia, the University of King's College and the first board of directors of the National Arts Centre in Ottawa. King's College granted him an honorary doctorate in 1980, prior to his serving on its board.

After his retirement, Kitz still went to his law firm to offer assistance and advice. He also played bridge with his friends at the Halifax Club, grew fruit, flowers and vegetables in his garden, read history, fished, listened to music, collected art and enjoyed debates.

Yossi Olmert advocates more Diaspora involvement with Israel

By REBECA KUROPATWA
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Yossi Olmert, the brother of Israel's acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, and a leading Middle East scholar, says that "building a safe and secure country, a good homeland for all Jews who want to be there is the key for the future of Israel."

In an interview, Olmert said that Diaspora support for Israel is important, but he would like to see more Diaspora Jews living in Israel and more participation of Diaspora Jews in the Israeli economy.

He added that Diaspora support of a mother country in the way that Jews support Israel is unique. "There is nothing like this in any other ethnic community in Canada or the U.S. So we are an exception there."

Olmert contends that "there should be an attitude of inherent solidarity between Diaspora Jews and Israeli Jews, and vice versa." But "people could decide for themselves what they want to do for each other.

"I don't think it is good for me to come and say, 'You should do this or that.' What is good for me is to tell them the needs of Israel, and for them to think of what they might like to do for Israel, the way they want to do it. We need to create a dialogue based on voluntary desires of people – to help each other, to build a country and to be one people."

Olmert observed that Israel should be a source of inspiration for people of goodwill who understand that you can build a new country, even when enemies surround you.

"You can construct a new society and revive an old language. Altogether, we have done well in Israel. We are looking ahead with a great deal of hope."

Israel still has many problems, and "not everyone likes the Jews, not everyone likes the State of Israel," he said, "but we are moving in the right direction. There are more and more people living in Israel. There are more and more achievements for Israel – scientific, educational and others."

Olmert said he hopes the future of Israel will be bright and that the country will do well economically. "It could be better, but it is on the right track. We are doing better in terms of getting international recognition for the State of Israel, and getting more and more international friends," he added.

On the subject of terrorism, Olmert said, "Terrorism is never justifiable. The killing of innocent people for the sake of killing them cannot be justified because killing innocent people in order to achieve political goals is morally wrong. It cannot be justified under any circumstances."

Olmert, fluent in both Hebrew and Arabic, was the director of the Israeli Government Press Office and an adviser to former prime minster Yitzchak Shamir.

Olmert was recently in Winnipeg where he addressed the Winnipeg Zionist Initiative at the Asper Jewish Community Campus. Members of the the Jewish Students' Association, March of the Living alumni, birthright israel participants and alumni and members of the Young Adult Division of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg attended Olmert's talk.

Salvador Dali images painted for Israel's 20th birthday

WINNIPEG — Salvador Dali is legendary for his surrealist, melting wristwatch imagery, but what the painter is arguably less known for is his later-life artistic shift, when emotive, religious and historical themes came to permeate his work.

The Winnipeg Art Gallery (WAG) is currently exhibiting Dali's "Aliyah Suite," until March 19. New York's Shorewood Publishers originally commissioned its 25 works in 1966 to commemorate the 20th anniversary of Israel's independence.

The WAG collection consists of 25 lithograph images all signed by the artist. Dali painted his originals in mixed media and gouache, and 250 lithographs were made in a Zurich and Paris printing house.

WAG curator Helene Delacretaz said the collection "was first displayed in 1968 at the Israel Museum, and the Winnipeg Art Gallery has owned [its version] since 1974."

She said the response to "Aliyah Suite," has been remarkable.

"The interest in this show has been huge, and it has drawn a wide demographic. People have come from as far away as California just to see it," Delacretaz said.

"Their reasons for coming vary: some are interested in Jewish history, and some are curious students and general public, interested in seeing rare Dali lithographs."

This Dali collection has a "very slick, emotional, and bittersweet quality to it," Delacretaz said. "It is involved, complex work."

An ironic twist to Dali having been selected to do this collection is that "he was known for his anti-Semitic views," Delacretaz said.

Nancy Mullick, a former University of Winnipeg student, wrote her thesis on the subject. In it, Mullick notes, "It was all a great game to Dali – pitting Jewish publisher against Jewish publisher—exploiting both Catholic and Jewish themes to the hilt."

Mullick describes Dali's pieces as depicting the "tension between the necessity of war and the desire for peace."

His paintings are both tragic and hopeful, she writes. "Dali is to be commended for his brilliant inspiration, which incorporated numerous facets of religious, political, and cultural history that is as relevant today as it was for the 20th anniversary of independence."

Delacretaz said she hopes people coming to see the exhibit "gain an appreciation for his later work. This work is much more emotionally bare. Each piece tells a story, without requiring knowledge of the actual events."

Daniel Pearl maintained dignity to the end, says his sister

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — This month marks four years since the brutal murder of Daniel Pearl, a reporter with the Wall Street Journal who was kidnapped and killed while on assignment in Pakistan.

Tamara Pearl, Daniel's older sister, delivered a talk titled "The Alchemy Of Hope" at Vancouver's King David High School recently. She spoke movingly about the kind of person her brother was, of her total desolation of spirit in the years following his death and of how she came to reconcile her grief and anger.

Pearl tried to introduce the audience to the Danny she knew, a man who found life fascinating and had a wonderful sense of humour. She read a humorous excerpt from one of his articles, recalling the time he had dressed as a woman in order to report on a striptease show exclusively for women.

Tamara Pearl

He was a determined man but was fairly confident of his safety in Afghanistan, promising Pearl he'd be careful and withdraw from any situations he thought might be dangerous.

On January 23, 2002, he went missing, throwing the Pearl family into what would be a month-long nightmare leading to his assassination in February 2002. "I was paralyzed with fear," Tamara recalled. "We waited in anguish in that month, sometimes receiving false news. And we implored the broadcasters not to mention the fact that he was Jewish and that his parents are Israeli."

After news of his death, Pearl found herself in a spiritual quandary. "I wrestled with whether life was good or not," she said. "How could I still embrace this world after seeing so much suffering? I talked to people, read all the books and walked around with lots of questions." To this day, she cannot bring herself to watch the recorded footage of her brother's murder.

His memory, however, inspired her to find a way out of the darkness of mourning, grief and constant questioning. "Danny always had complete faith in reality, despite the tragic things he witnessed as a journalist," Pearl said. "He valued people and friendships, and built bridges through his writing. And he was very open and accepting of other cultures, wanting to understand them as best he could."

Even in his last words, Daniel maintained his dignity and strength. "He said 'I am Jewish' with such inner strength and conviction, never losing his connection to that which is life affirming," Pearl said. "He transformed the hatred that surrounded him in his final hours into his life-affirming identity, and that was inspiring to me."

The Pearl family channelled their sadness into a humane response, establishing the Daniel Pearl Foundation, a non-profit organization that aims to promote cross-cultural understanding, combat geographical and religious hatred, encourage responsible and creative journalism and unite people through the universal language of music. All these goals were inspired by Daniel, a reporter who travelled with his violin and mandolin, using music to bring people together.

The foundation has an array of programs and initiatives. There's Daniel Pearl Music Days, a week-long network of concerts that take place worldwide in October, dedicated to promoting tolerance and humanity. There are journalism initiatives such as the annual Daniel Pearl Fellowship, which brings mid-career journalists from South Asia and the Middle East to a U.S. newsroom for six months, where they can experience a free press environment. And there's the Daniel Pearl Dialogue for Muslim-Jewish Understanding, in which professors Akbar Ahmed and Judea Pearl discuss contentious issues that divide the two faiths. Ahmed and Pearl have so far brought the dialogue to 11 cities in the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada.

"I've discovered that being Jewish gives us the tools we need to perform alchemy, and ultimately repair the world," Pearl said. "By creating this foundation, we're using Danny's legacy to help bring people together. In this way, he's still alive."

Winnipeg federation withdraws from Folklorama

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish Federation of Winnipeg decided to withdraw from Folklorama in 2006, citing financial losses over the past four years.

Folklorama is Winnipeg's yearly summer celebration of the city's ethnic communities. The federation has operated Shalom Square – the Israel pavilion – at the Asper Jewish Community Campus for the past four years, ever since the Rady Jewish Community Centre withdrew its support from the pavilion.

A committee led by Ted Lyons, the federation's current president; Michael Kowalson; and Jeff Lieberman, the Rady JCC's current president, managed Shalom Square. Bob Freedman handled the pavilion's finances and administration.

Lyons reports that the pavilion lost about $7,000 each year of the first three years of federation management. Last year, financial losses reached $15,000. Poor weather accounted for some of the losses, he says.

Attendance was down this year because of the August long weekend, which fell on the week the Israel Pavilion was open. Folklorama runs two weeks, with half of the pavilions open the first week and the rest open the second week.

Food costs at the pavilion have always been a problem, Lyons says. "Most pavilions make a profit from the food. The first year, we agreed with Shmoozers, the campus restaurant, to handle all of the food and we would split the profits." Shmoozers made a modest profit, but did not want to continue the next year.

As a result of a new agreement with Schmoozers, the pavilion tried different menus and pre-plated foods over the next three years but nothing worked well, Lyons said.

He points out that the Israel pavilion has to rely on Shmoozers services to keep food at the right temperature. "Health inspectors always check our pavilion," he says.

Lyons describes Shalom Square's food as "only average" compared to other pavilions, but he says the Israel pavilion has the best entertainment in the Chai Folk Ensemble. And while the famed Israel dance troupe donates its services, there are ancillary costs. For example, the stage costs about $12,000 to rent each year.

"We considered building a stage," Lyons says. "That would cost about $20,000 and could be used by others during the year. We applied for and received a grant from the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba to build a stage two years ago, but did not use it because there is no place on-site to store it."

Lyons says that his committee has received letters and verbal communication from Jewish past presidents of the Folk Arts Council of Winnipeg who expressed dismay and concern over the decision not to participate this summer.

"Bob Freedman [federation's longtime executive director] and I have spoken to many who agreed with the approach when they were given all of the facts," Lyons says.

A new committee, led by David Kroft, was formed to look at all sides of the issue and make a recommendation to federation's executive and board about future participation in Folklorama. Committee members had some ideas and tried to raise new sponsorship moneys, but in the end they agreed to withdraw the Israel pavilion from Folklorama this year.

Shalom Square has always had a large volunteer base and many of the volunteers are disappointed about the federation's decision to close the pavilion. "We all hope that Shalom Square will reopen in 2007," says Avrum Charach, one of the chairs of last summer's pavilion.

Threats to school rekindle security concerns

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Two threatening phone calls to the same Jewish elementary school in less than a week this month have reminded the Montreal Jewish community that despite its heavy investment in security, little can be done to escape harassment by apparent pranksters.

Opinion is divided on whether schools and other Jewish institutions should automatically decide to evacuate after receiving a menacing message, but when there is no evidence of danger – as did the administration of Jewish People's and Peretz Schools (JPPS) on both occasions.

The brief calls to JPPS on Feb. 2 at approximately 1 p.m. and on Feb. 6 at around 11 a.m. mentioned a bomb. They were apparently made by two different males in English. Police and FEDERATION CJA community security co-ordinator Michel Bujold were called immediately and arrived within five minutes in both cases.

Police spokesperson Const. Stephane Eid, said the Feb. 2 caller spoke of a bomb being at the school, and the Feb. 6 caller said, "today is the day." Eid said the investigation continues, but police have no suspects. He said police have no knowledge of similar recent threats to Jewish institutions.

Although an inspection inside and outside the Van Horne Avenue school found nothing suspicious in either incident, JPPS administrators sent the more than 500 students to the nearby Gelber Conference Centre. They walked the two blocks with their teachers to the centre, where parents were asked to pick up their children. The school remained closed for the rest of both days.

JPPS executive director Barry Rishikof said the community's protocol in such incidents was "followed to the letter" and that the safety of the children must be paramount. He would not, however, discuss the incidents in any detail, referring questions to Canadian Jewish Congress, because, he said, "this has an impact on all schools and institutions."

CJC spokesperson Eta Yudin downplayed the seriousness of the incidents, but left specific comment to Rabbi Reuben Poupko, chair of the community-wide security co-ordinating committee.

Rabbi Poupko suggested the school overreacted, causing unnecessary panic and possibly encouraging more threats.

"What happened is that on two days, a 30-second prank by two different people was able to terrorize a whole school. Common sense dictates that there was no real threat. All schools, Jewish and non-Jewish, public and private, receive these prank calls from time to time. Even though [JPPS] was given the all-clear, they still decided to evacuate," he said.

The community guidelines on such situations has established a protocol on what to do, but whether to evacuate is a "judgment call" by those in charge, he said.

However, Rabbi Poupko avoided directed criticism. "It is very hard not to take that extra step when hundreds of children are involved. I don't know what it would be like to have that responsibility."

He noted that in the case of the United Talmud Torahs (UTT) firebombing in April 2004, there was no warning. "In the overwhelming number of cases, those who talk about it don't do it."

The first threatening call to JPPS coincided with the news that UTT arsonist Sleiman El-Merhebi's statutory release, after serving two-thirds of his jail sentence, had been approved by Correctional Service of Canada.

The UTT attack was what prompted the federation to raise $2.3 million to invest in the security of all Jewish schools and day-care centres. This included the hiring of the New York-based firm International Security Associates to conduct an assessment of all 40 campuses and the hiring of the first community-wide security expert. Bujold was head of security at Concordia University for 12 years.

Equipment such as surveillance cameras, intercom and access-control devices, as well as improved fencing and lighting, have been installed at the schools. Staff have also been trained in safety procedures.

Private security guards were also placed at all schools, at the federation's expense, for the remainder of the school year after the UTT attack, but few today have them.

Rabbi Poupko conceded that "everyone thinks they are an expert" on security. "If you ask the JPPS parents, half will say the school is not doing enough, and half will say that it did too much."

Rishikof acknowledged that the opinion among parents on how the school handled the incidents is "across the spectrum," but he added that all of the school's board members are also JPPS parents and they approved of how things were done.

Following the second call to JPPS, the school held a meeting with parents, teachers and other staff in which concerns were addressed by Bujold and Simonetta Barth, commander of police station 25, who said police have stepped up patrols in the area.

At the meeting, the school also announced the implementation of further security measures, but Rishikof asked that they not be reported.

Counsellors from Jewish Family Services came to JPPS to speak to students and staff.

Rabbi Poupko concluded: "The lesson from this is that we need to take reasonable steps after any threat, using common sense and the advice of police and security professionals. It takes fortitude to say enough measures have been taken."

While Bujold couldn't be reached for comment, when he was hired in 2004 after the UTT arson, he said that "we have to find the right balance between ensuring the safety of our children, their teachers and their administrators, while ensuring that they are able to learn in an open and nurturing environment. We don't want security to become so overly obtrusive that it interferes excessively with the daily routine at school."

Four Jews among Order of Canada appointees

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Montrealer Steven Cummings, a former president of FEDERATION CJA and a current member of The CJN's board of directors, was one of four Jewish Canadians who were named to the Order of Canada or had their rank promoted earlier this month.

"It's an honour, a great honour to be recognized by this great country, and I'm thrilled," Cummings told The CJN.

Gov. Gen. Michaëlle Jean announced the appointments, among 56 in all, on Feb. 3.

Cummings, president and CEO of the real estate company Maxwell Cummings & Sons Holdings, said he didn't know who nominated him.

Cummings was named to the order in recognition of his numerous volunteer activities. He has served as president of the Jewish General Hospital and its foundation, co-chaired the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), and is founding chair of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre and founding co-chair of ProMontreal.

Cummings also serves on the boards of several public and private companies, including the Caisse de dépôt et de placement du Québec and VIA Rail.

Three other prominent Jewish Canadians, all of Toronto, were among those named to, or promoted within, the order.

• Bernard Ostry was promoted to the order's highest rank, companion, in recognition of his career in public service at both the provincial and federal levels, as well as for his role in "shaping Canada's and Ontario's social, cultural and industrial policies," and as an "outspoken advocate of cultural sovereignty and ethics in public service." At one time Canada's highest ranking public servant, Ostry served as deputy minister in a number of ministries, and he served as chair and CEO of TVOntario, as well as on the boards of several universities, and on the boards of the Canadian Conference of the Arts and Heritage Canada.

• Gerald Schwartz was made an officer of the order for achievements in the sphere of "industry/commerce/business." A native of Winnipeg, Schwartz, with the late Izzie Asper, formed CanWest Capital Corporation, which later became the media giant CanWest Global Communications. Schwartz then founded Onex Corporation, becoming its chair, president and CEO and making it one of Canada's largest companies. Within the Jewish community, Schwartz is a co-founder of CIJA, and he established the Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman Centre for Jewish Learning at Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple, served as honorary chef de mission for Maccabi Canada, and has been active in UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

• Lawyer Clayton Ruby was made a member of the order for his legal and social activism. Ruby practises criminal, constitutional and administrative law, and has served as counsel in many high-profile cases. He has served as a director of PEN Canada, the Sierra Legal Defence Fund and other human rights and environmental groups.

Psychologist's book helps people cope with life changes

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

After an unexpected health crisis forced her to put her life and work on hold, Dr. Sharyn Salsberg Ezrin was inspired to write a book to help others through their own life or work transitions.

Dr. Sharyn Salsberg Ezrin

The idea for the book emerged when she began talking about her transition with others, who were going through their own life-changing situations, said Salsberg Ezrin, an applied psychologist and the author of Living Through Transitions (Trafford Publishing).

"The experience that I had was learning to live with arthritis. It took me through many different phases," she said explaining that her bout with arthritis was due to an auto-immune disease, not the kind that is brought on by wear and tear of joints.

"It was unlike any transition I had ever planned or faced unexpectedly because I did not know how or when it would end. My transition lasted three years and my work and life situations changed as a result," she wrote in her introduction.

"I decided to research stories of others who had experienced work or life transitions so I might test out some of the ideas and approaches I has developed for myself."

She began to interview people in 2003 and developed a structured questionnaire for 75 people.

"One of the things that I learned was that whether it was planned or unplanned, there were some features in their transition experiences that were very different."

Salsberg Ezrin explained that there are many unexpected situations in life that would lead someone to want to make a change, such as a death in the family, the loss of a job, or an illness.

Others may simply be looking to take matters into their own hands to improve their lives.

"So, what we have to do is understand what their patterns have been up to that point in time. What it takes to make a change, what they need before they make a transition and how to prepare themselves."

While her book is classified as a self-help book, she said it is different from most others.

"One of the things that I found, which was not helpful to people, is that many of the self-help books are very prescriptive. There are many steps and you have to follow the sequence they recommend. You are actually making yourself work hard, which is something I didn't want [for the book]," Salsberg Ezrin said.

"I wanted people to understand the process and to value the process and to find the process meaningful, rather than to rush through it to finish it."

The book is divided into two parts. The first, the courage of the heart, is what helps you move beyond the sense of shock and despair, and the second, the courage of the mind, is what helps you establish the steps you need to take to complete the transition.

"If the person who is being coached is gung-ho and knows what they need to do, and is focused and practices, it is very hard for them not to do well because [the process] is so logical," Salsberg Ezrin said.

The transition, which usually takes between six months to a year to complete, would be very hard to do alone, without the support of family and friends, she said.

Salsberg Ezrin, who will be launching her book on Feb. 27 at the University of Toronto at 5:30 pm, hopes that the book will act as a catalyst, and "give people a reality check," about where they are in life and dreams that are within their reach.

Salsberg Ezrin also hopes the process will be an enjoyable experience.

"You should enjoy the transition as an end in itself. And most of the other books that are written with this idea in mind put more emphasis on the transition as a means to an end. I see it as an end in itself."

Is Russia's Hamas overture the end of the 'road map'?

By DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — Cracks are showing in the international demands on Hamas to recognize Israel and renounce terrorism before it takes over the Palestinian Authority.

Ignoring the preconditions, Russian President Vladimir Putin has offered to host leaders of the radical Islamic group in Moscow, prompting similar overtures from elsewhere in Europe.

"We believe that it is an initiative that can contribute to advancing our positions," French Foreign Ministry spokesperson Denis Simonneau was quoted as saying late last week in Ha'aretz. "We share with Russia the goal of leading Hamas toward positions that would allow for the goal of two states living in peace and security to be reached."

There was consternation in Israel, which had hoped to parlay Hamas' unexpected victory in last month's Palestinian Authority election into a chance to make the Palestinian terrorist group embrace a new political pragmatism.

While analysts wrote off Putin's move a bid to boost his diplomatic standing, many Israelis predicted it would spell the end of the "road map" to peaceful coexistence with the Palestinians, which had been co-sponsored by Russia.

"As far as Israel is concerned, the Quartet, which adopted the road map in 2003, now becomes a 'Trio' whose members are the United States, European Union and United Nations," analyst Ze'ev Schiff wrote in Ha'aretz.

Fending off a hailstorm of Israeli criticism – as well as a possible showdown with Washington – Russia insisted it only wanted to help tame Hamas.

"We will ask Hamas to change their position according to the latest decisions of the Quartet, which are recognition of Israel, rejection of terrorism and execution of the Palestinian Authority's past agreements" with Israel, said Russia's Middle East envoy Alexander Kalugin.

Such declarations did little to convince Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, who has worked to convince the international community that Hamas reform must precede its recognition abroad.

"First they start with talks, after that they 'try to understand.' Then give money, then legitimacy. This is what we must act against," she told Israel Radio.

"This is a black-and-white situation," Livni said. "The biggest problem is that Hamas does not accept the terms of the Quartet."

But he told his Cabinet that once the new Palestinian Authority Parliament is formed – beginning this coming weekend – "the rules of the game will change." The remarks were interpreted as a threat that Israel could sanction a future Hamas-led government by refusing to hand over taxes collected on behalf of the Palestinian Authority.

Despite the pressure piled upon it, Hamas insists it has no plan to change its charter – calling for jihad against the Jewish state – or give up its weapons. At best, some Hamas leaders have offered Israel an extended truce – cold comfort, given that the group's theosophy predicts Zionism's end by the early 2020s.

Some Israelis predict that Hamas will end up paying at least lip service to the idea of peace, which will be eagerly welcomed by an international community embattled by the U.S.-led "war on terror" and the more recent Danish cartoon furor.

"Hamas will say something, out of the corner of its mouth, a hazy bit of mumbling with deliberate dissembling, in order to allow the world to establish ties with it, talk to it, and recommend it to Israel as a negotiating partner," wrote Ma'ariv's editor-in-chief, Amnon Dankner, in a front-page commentary.

"Will the tensions between the Muslim world and the Western world lead Europe to appease the Muslims in Israeli coin?"

Iran's Jews speak out

JTA

TEHRAN — The leader of Iranian Jewry criticized the country's president for denying the Holocaust.

"How is possible to ignore all of the undeniable evidence existing for the exile and massacre of the Jews in Europe during World War II?" Haroun Yashayaei wrote in a recent letter to President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, copies of which reached the international press this week. "Challenging one of the most obvious and saddening events of 20th-century humanity has created astonishment among the people of Iran and spread fear and anxiety among the small Jewish community of Iran."

There was no word on whether Ahmadinejad, who has recently drawn global censure for his Holocaust denials and calls for Israel to be "wiped off the map," responded to the letter.

There are around 25,000 Jews in Iran, which has a total population of 70 million people, and the community is under close scrutiny by the state.

Sharon undergoes colostomy

By JUDY SIEGEL-ITZKOVICH
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — During Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's three-hour emergency operation to remove a third of his large intestine on Saturday, a stoma was inserted into his abdominal wall so that the condition of his colon could be followed without necessarily having to perform further surgery.

A colostomy procedure was carried out, which involves the attachment of the cut end of the remaining colon to an opening (stoma) in the abdominal wall, allowing feces to emerge through it and into a bag instead of the normal process. It can be reversed if, and when, there is no further necrosis of the colon, which forced the urgent operation, Hadassah Medical Organization sources said on Sunday.

Contrary to reports in the Hebrew newspapers, his intestinal surgery does not automatically require another operation in a few days. If blood supply to the remaining large intestine remains good and more tissue does not become gangrenous, he will not have to have more surgery.

Hadassah sources said that the necrosis resulted not from a blood clot in a branch of the supreme mesenteric artery to his colon, but merely from reduced blood flow, which happens quite often in long-term comatose patients.

Sharon remains in serious but stable condition and not in immediate danger in the ground-floor intensive-care unit of the Hadassah University Medical Center in Jerusalem's Ein Kerem. He will continue to receive his nutrition intravenously until he is well enough for the food tube to his stomach to be restored.

A spokesperson for Hadassah Medical Organization declined to comment on an anonymous quote in Ha'aretz on Sunday in which a "senior Hadassah doctor" claimed that if Sharon had "not been prime minister," the emergency operation would not have been performed and he would be allowed to die.

The move from the seventh-floor neurosurgery intensive-care unit, where he has been treated for nearly six weeks since his massive hemorrhagic stroke on Jan. 4, to the ground-floor intensive care unit was complicated by security logistics.

Staffers on the seventh floor said they were "sad to see him go," but some family members were relieved because the high security there made access more difficult.

Consultations were due to be held this week about the possibility of several long-term nursing and rehabilitation facilities where he could have been transferred, but due to his setback, they have been postponed.

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN's 2006 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However, they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, Feb. 24, 2006. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 3, 2006.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 16, 2006. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Hamas on agenda as German foreign minister visits

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier arrived late Sunday for his first visit to Israel, during which he was expected to reiterate Germany's strong position against dealing with Hamas until it disarms and disavows terrorism, recognizes Israel and accepts all previous agreements.

Both German and Israeli officials said emphatically that Steinmeier would have no contact with anyone related to Hamas. He was to meet with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and PA Foreign Minister Nasser al-Kidwa in Ramallah on Tuesday. Merkel made crystal-clear her opposition to dealing with Hamas during her visit here.

In related developments, Livni last week rebuffed Qatari efforts to "mediate" with Hamas, saying Israel will have nothing to do with the organization until it changes its ways.

The Qatari overture came last Thursday evening, when Livni was in the United States. The Qatari officials who contacted her discussed brokering a long-term hudna (cease-fire) between Hamas and Israel.

According to Israeli officials, Livni said there would be "no middle ground with Hamas," and that the organization needed to accept the three conditions placed on it by Israel and the international community: disarm and disavow terrorism, recognize Israel and accept all the agreements with it.

Olmert told the cabinet at its weekly meeting Sunday that "the rules of the game will change" as soon as the Hamas-led Palestinian Legislative Council is sworn in.

The new PLC is expected to be sworn in on Saturday.

Olmert's comments came in the context of explaining his decision last week to transfer some $50 million (US) in tax and custom revenue to the Palestinian Authority. He took a jab at Likud chairman Binyamin Netanyahu, who criticized him for approving the transfers, saying that when Netanyahu was finance minister the funds were transferred sometimes just a day or two after a suicide attack.

Olmert said once the new government was sworn in, the PA would then effectively become a Hamas government. He said from Israel's perspective "it is unimportant if it is a government of technocrats or the ministers are formal Hamas members."

Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz, who also briefed the cabinet, said once the council was sworn in, Abbas was expected to charge Hamas with forming a government. He said this would begin the "countdown" toward the establishment of a new government and the possibility that Abbas would transfer responsibility for some of the PA security services to Hamas.

Mofaz noted that in this case, Hamas would be in charge of fulfilling the PA's commitment to dismantle the terrorist infrastructures and move toward implementing the "road map" peace plan, something extremely unlikely since Hamas officials have said they have no intention of recognizing Israel or of "abandoning the resistance."

Olmert termed Russian President Vladimir Putin's recent invitation of Hamas to Moscow for talks a mistake, even though the Russians said they were not backpedalling from the three conditions the international community has placed on Hamas. He also said French President Jacques Chirac assured him during a phone conversation last week that France supported Israel's position on this matter. This despite a French foreign ministry spokesperson's comment Saturday showing understanding for Putin's initiative.

Mofaz said Russian Defence Minister Sergei Ivanov told him at a NATO meeting over the weekend that Putin's invitation was meant to pressure Hamas through direct dialogue, not through public statements. He said Israel's position on the matter was made clear.

Livni briefed the cabinet on her talks in Washington and at the United Nations last week. She said it did not matter whether Hamas was democratically elected or not, or whether people voted for Hamas because they were sick of PA corruption and not because of Hamas' jihad ideology. What mattered was the bottom line, she said, which was that Hamas was a terrorist organization and that a government it led would be a terrorist government.

Abbas said before the elections the vote was needed to give him the legitimacy necessary to dismantle the terrorist organizations and put the PA security apparatus under one authority. Livni said she called on the United States and the UN to hold him to this pledge.

Vote 'simplistic and unbalanced'

such as Caterpillar Inc., until they change their policies."

The decision was a "one-eyed" response that "only rebukes one side," said Rev. Carey, and displayed the Church's "propensity to reduce complex issues to black and white."

In his Feb. 10 letter to Rabbi Sacks, Archbishop Williams said the church has been misunderstood and had "not resolved to disinvest." Sacks, evidently prepared to try and downplay the dispute, welcomed the Williams clarification.

Archbishop Williams wrote that the church was seeking to register its "concern" over the "demolition of Palestinian homes" by the Israeli government and to "review whether we should or could continue with an investment policy which appeared to accept something with which we were deeply uneasy."

The archbishop acknowledged that the timing of the Synod vote was "unfortunate," following closely upon the Hamas electoral victory, but he stated that the church had "emphatically not" recommended a boycott or compromised its "commitment to oppose any form of anti-Semitism at home or abroad."

The Church of England's own ethical investment advisory group recommended against divestment last fall. While the latest vote is not binding on the church, it would probably compel the advisory group to review its decision when it meets in May, Lou Henderson, a spokesperson for the Church of England, told the New York Times.

A year ago, the Anglican Church of Canada assured Canadian Jewish Congress that it had "no intention at this time" of exploring divestment in Israel.

Nothing has changed since, Eleanor Johnson, director of partnerships for the Canadian church, told The CJN's Ron Csillag.

"We are looking at ethical screening of our investment. But that's not new," Johnson said. "There aren't very many moments for those kinds of considerations in terms of policy. Nothing has happened in terms of policy."

She said the Canadian church has no investments in Caterpillar.

Unlike the Roman Catholic Church, the Anglican Church, with 77 million members worldwide, is divided into 38 self-governing "provinces."

Also last week, a Presbyterian committee investigating the U.S. church's possible financial disengagement from Israel said it would not recommend divestment to the church's general assembly in June.

The church said it needs more time before it makes its decision, Religion News Service reported.

The Presbyterian Church USA upset Jewish groups when it voted in 2004 to pursue "selective" divestment from Caterpillar, Motorola, ITT Industries and United Technologies if the companies refuse to stop doing business with Israel.

But the Presbyterian Church has yet to divest from any company, and the idea has largely failed to gain support elsewhere, including within the Episcopal Church USA.

Jon Benjamin, CEO of the Board of Deputies of British Jews, branded the Anglican vote "simplistic" and "unbalanced."

"What it shows is that the thinking of people who support these resolutions is not very sophisticated," he said. There were sound reasons why the Israeli government had adopted its security policies, but these were never "aired or discussed" by the synod, Benjamin said.

During the one-hour debate that preceded the vote, a letter from the Episcopal bishop of Jerusalem, the Rt. Rev. Riah Abu al-Assal, was read to the synod.

In it, the bishop complained that "nonviolent instruments such as divestment from companies that produce death rather than life, does [sic] not get the same attention" as the church gives to issues such as human sexuality.

American Jewish leaders, who thought they had successfully swayed Protestant churches on divestment, were alarmed by the Church of England's decision.

"You could say that it was naivete on the part of the Presbyterians when they voted like this two years ago," said Rabbi David Elcott, director of United States interreligious affairs at the American Jewish Congress. "But you can't say that now, with the election of Hamas and the other changes. The Anglican decision pulls them out of the coalition for peace and puts them on the side of violence."

But one influential English bishop, the Rt. Rev. John Gladwin, said he held Israel responsible for the worsening plight of Palestinian Christians, telling the synod, "Caterpillar may be a company being used for dreadful purposes across the world, but the problem is not Caterpillar. The problem is the situation in the Middle East and the government of Israel."

A counter motion offered by the pro-Israel pressure group Anglicans for Israel was not presented to the synod, which adopted the motion by a show of hands, with Archbishop Williams voting in favour, and the Archbishop of York, John Sentamu, abstaining.

The World Jewish Congress (WJC) decried the Anglican decision as a "shameful" act and one that is reminiscent of the "Dark Ages."

Israel Singer, chair of the WJC's political council said in Jerusalem, where the congress last week held meetings of its governing board: "We will continue our dialogue with other churches, such as the Catholic Church, and through dialogue, we will fight such one-sided acts."

Livi warns of 'terror state'

The Palestinian Authority will become a "terror state" if Hamas controls the Palestinian parliament without renouncing violence or recognizing Israel, Israeli foreign minister Tzipi Livni told reporters last week after meeting with U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in Washington. Rice said the United States would continue reviewing its aid to the Palestinians in light of Hamas' victory. "There simply has to be a recognition of the State of Israel's right to exist," Rice said. The two also discussed Iran's nuclear plans and regional security issues.

Katsav to visit Greece

Moshe Katsav was to visit Greece in what is believed to be the first state visit by an Israeli president to Athens. During the Feb. 14-16 visit, Katsav was to hold meetings with Greek President Karolos Papoulias, Prime Minister Costas Karamanlis, and Greek Jewish leaders. The presidents were also slated to travel to Thessaloniki together, where they were to visit the Jewish museum and the Holocaust memorial to recall Jews from the city who died in the Shoah.

Gaza farmers to be retrained

Hebrew University plans to retrain evacuated Gaza Strip settlement farmers. The university said last week some 100 farmers evacuated from Gaza would receive advanced training at its faculty of agricultural, food and environmental quality sciences. The state-funded studies begin March 5 and will last up to 24 months. The project aims to help evacuees return to farming.

Soccer game a go

A Denmark-Israel soccer match will go on as scheduled. The Danish Football Association confirmed it would send a team to Israel for the March game despite concerns the Danes would cancel the match because of fears of reprisals. Denmark has been the target of Muslim protests after a Danish newspaper printed editorial cartoons that many Muslims find offensive.

Hebron observers forced out

Members of the Temporary International Presence in Hebron were forced to leave their headquarters for the first time since its inception because of violent Palestinian protests over Danish cartoons seen as insulting Islam. Scores of protesters last week threw stones and some forced their way into the mission headquarters, damaging property.

Gay pride stabber jailed

An Israeli man was jailed for 12 years for stabbing three people at last June's Jerusalem gay pride parade. Yishai Schlissel, a 30-year-old West Bank settler was also fined $65,000. The court said it gave him a stiff sentence to deter more ideological violence. Schlissel said God ordered him to carry out the attack to defend Jerusalem's sanctity.

Amona inquiry might also probe army's conduct

By YIGAL GRAYEFF
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — The commission of inquiry that will examine the actions of the police during the evacuation of Amona two weeks ago should also scrutinize the army's performance, Internal Security Minister Gideon Ezra said last week.

"The body that has control over Judea and Samaria is the army and not the police," he said. "The police was at the service of the army. The commission needs to examine everything."

The Knesset has voted to establish the commission to look into the violence at Amona, when police clashed with demonstrators who were trying to prevent the demolition of nine houses. The Police Investigative Department (PID) said early last week it would conduct its own inquiry.

Ezra agreed with the police officers that the army should have done more to prevent protesters from reaching the outpost, but said this was something for the commission to examine.

Ezra and the police said they respected the Knesset vote, but privately, officers were unhappy that all the focus had been placed on them.

"The army was responsible for the evacuation. They should also be criticized," said one officer.

"Why didn't the army ensure that those who arrived were barred from entering?" he added. "If the army had done its job properly, these people wouldn't have entered and there would have been less of a mess."

Before the police carried out the evacuation of the houses, army units had taken up positions on the perimeter and were supposed to prevent protesters from arriving in Amona. In addition, soldiers set up roadblocks on the approach to the outpost.

However, the officer said this was not enough. "The army should have closed the place earlier," he said. "They knew that they were going to carry out an evacuation on that Wednesday. They should have closed the area two or three days or even a week beforehand in order to stop people from arriving...

"Roadblocks aren't closing the place off. They shouldn't have allowed them to get to the area where the houses were located."

"There is a lot of anger among officers who were in the field," he said. "It gives legitimacy to those who want to use violence against the police. If a policeman did do something wrong, then the PID will investigate."

The army declined to comment on Ezra's statements and those of the police, saying it was a political matter. However, senior Israel Defence Forces officers said that the strategy of Central Command was to disturb the routine life of the thousands of settlers living in the area as little as possible.

"The main road serves thousands of settlers living in the region, and the decision not to set up checkpoints earlier was measured against the disturbances they would be forced to endure had such measures been taken," one army officer said.

Ezra said that it was very difficult to close off the area.

"The place was open from all four sides," he said. "They came by foot from the wadis. It wasn't possible to stop all of them. It is impossible to close an area for a long time."

The Knesset House Committee will take up the issue and define the commission's brief, after which the plenum will carry out a second reading. The commission is expected to be charged with examining complaints that the police used excessive violence and that officers physically, verbally and even sexually abused settlers and their supporters at the scene.

However, Ezra doesn't believe the commission should have been set up in the first place.

"I don't think the Knesset should be the PID," he said, adding: "The police were carrying out a court decision, and there is therefore no reason for a commission of inquiry. I will give my full backing to the police. They predicted that there would be violence and prepared for it beforehand."

Internal Security Ministry spokesperson Yehuda Maman said the commission should also examine the role of the protesters.

"If you are already carrying out a probe, then investigate the leaders who encouraged the evacuees to use violence," he said. "It must not be forgotten that the protesters prepared for this with blocks and iron."

About 250 people were injured in the clashes, including 82 police officers. Of the latter, 54 were hospitalized and all but two were discharged the same day. A teenage demonstrator's skull was fractured, and his mother said he had been hit by a police baton.

One border police officer, Alon Madar, 19, almost lost his sight after being hit by a piece of glass, while cavalry officer Peretz Margalit was injured in the leg by a stone. Both were hospitalized and released earlier this week.

A border police officer was stabbed with a makeshift weapon and lightly injured, as were officers who were hit on the head by blocks and large stones. According to Judea and Samaria Police spokesperson Shlomi Sagi, riot gear prevented their injuries from being more serious.

SUPREME COURT CHIEF JUSTICE

BORA LASKIN

PERSONALITY OF THE MONTH

This month, we wish to honour the memory of Bora Laskin, the son of Russian immigrants who became the first Jewish judge on the Supreme Court of Canada.

After graduating from U of T and Harvard Law schools with Master's degrees, he was confronted with law firm's quotas for Jewish lawyers, so he went to work teaching at the University of Toronto. There he took on a prodigious workload, teaching more courses than anyone else, working late into the night to satisfy his commitments.

Appointed to Canada's top court in 1970, Chief Justice Laskin served for 14 years. Under his leadership judges were encouraged to include social issues in their deliberations. This remains one of his most important changes to jurisprudence because even today, it affects the quality of life for all Canadians.

Every month, Gilbert & Associates features a signature portrait from the current work or archives of Al Gilbert, C.M., Master Photographer. The timeless quality of classical portraiture has always depended on the special relationship between the photographer and his subject.

Now you can sit for a one-of-a-kind, signature portrait by Al Gilbert, member of the Order of Canada and the artist who photographed Prime Minister David Ben Gurion. Your portrait may be proudly displayed at home and office and will join a gallery of prominent Gilbert portraits, soon to be donated to the National Archives.

"Two years ago I had my Bar Mitzvah and contributed to the Kroft Bar/Bat Mitzvah Fund at Toronto Hadassah-WIZO. I bought siddurim and tallitot for boys at Ben Yakir Youth Village. During winter break I was in Israel and visited Ben Yakir. I met some of the boys who received my gifts. I wasn't sure what to expect, but when I got there, we quickly started talking. We had a great conversation about what having a Bar Mitzvah meant to us. After I met the boys, I felt really good about what I did; I realized they were great guys who unfortunately have had some unlucky situations."

Celebrate with the Stars

"People often have the misconception that planning a wedding, bar or bat mitzvah has to be a stressful and tedious experience," states Marla Kay, organizer of "A Celebration of Stars," a trade show which assembles a large variety of party professionals serving the Jewish community.

"As a bridal and party consultant over the past 20 years, I know how wonderful it is to plan a simcha. There are so many details to be looked after. For the past 10 years at each of my shows, I have brought together over 60 professional "stars" of the party industry to display their wonderful products and services."

This year, the Celebration of Stars Wedding, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show will take place on Wednesday, March 22, 2006 at Meron Banquet Hall. It starts at 6 p.m. and runs until 10:00 p.m. This year Manieh Fanaian Couture will be presenting their 2006 bridal collection on a fabulous runway fashion show, which will begin promptly at 8 p.m.

When you attend the Celebration of Stars Show, all of your entire party needs will be represented and you will be able to meet our party's finest on an informal basis. Each of the various stages of party planning will be available and by having more than one company displaying their unique talents in a particular category, you have the choice of which individual will suit your needs. You may choose from a variety of party professionals who will strive to maintain the highest standards of excellence in their particular area of expertise. You will be offered bridal and party consultants, catering (Kosher), invitations, florists, make-up artists, personalized party favours, photography, videography, cakes, creative room decor and centrepieces, orchestras, DJ's, and jewellery & giftware. Some of the "stars" are very well known in the simcha industry and there will also be some new faces as well.

"Every Celebration of Stars Bridal, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show that I have organized has proven to be so successful for both guests and exhibitors that as soon as I finish one, I begin plans for the next one," says Kay. "Organizing a party is what I do best and I think that it is certainly reflected in my shows."

Come and see for yourself that the Celebration of Stars has got it all and is one show that you don't want to miss. Admission and parking is free. For further information ... contact Marla Kay at 905-669-0777.

Grease raises funds for kids with cancer

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

With theatre as his personal passion and charity a core value, it made perfect sense for Jason Spetter to start up a production company that raises money for important causes.

Now in its fourth year, Fallen Rock Productions will be presenting the timeless classic Grease next week, with all proceeds going towards the Pediatric Oncology Group of Ontario.

"To me, Grease is a slice of life from the 1950s," says Spetter, 33, who in addition to being co-creator of Fallen Rock with Eric Weisz, is a lawyer by day and the director of Grease by night.

In addition to its charitable mandate, Fallen Rock strives to nurture young, local talent, of which there is no shortage in Toronto, according to Spetter.

"We really promote ourselves as being a company looking to give young performers the opportunity to show their stuff," he says. "And fortunately, in the city at this time, there's not a lot of work for stage actors, so we've been successful in finding actors."

The 40 or so cast and crew members of Grease are primarily volunteering their time, though many have professional training and experience.

Choreographer Marc Kimelman, who teaches dance professionally, says it's especially rewarding to work with volunteers because they seem to be extra appreciative.

"It's so great seeing how dedicated and committed they are," says the 25-year-old. "For them, it's more fun than work. So when I'm with them, I'm reminded of how much fun it is and I never associate work with it because they bring such a great vibe."

Since most of the people involved have other jobs or school commitments, rehearsals were spread out over three months, with the group getting together a couple of times a week.

While Grease's songs and dances are cult classics, Kimelman notes he has thrown in a few twists and turns to keep things fresh.

"With Grease Lightning, we've tried changing it with different steps," he says.

"And we've done the same thing with Hand Jives, by creating a big production number that makes it much bigger than it normally is."

Fallen Rock Production's cast of Grease

Spetter says much more is in store for Fallen Rock and he's intent on growing the company.

"I hope we continue to build our reputation in the community and grow our success, artistically and financially," he offers. "The more well known we are, the easier it is to raise funds, and that's the ultimate goal."

JEWISH MUSIC FESTIVAL SET FOR NEW ORLEANS

The New Orleans International Jewish Music Festival will be "integral to rebuilding Jewish culture in New Orleans after the devastation of Hurricane Katrina," according to co-organizer Gary Rosenthal, a Washington, D.C.-based artist who hopes the festival "will reinvigorate Jewish culture in The Big Easy."

Scheduled for April 1 and 2, the two-day celebration of Jewish music and culture features the likes of Neshama Carlebach, the Moshav Band, RebbeSoul, Sam Glaser, Theresa Andersson, the New Orleans Klezmer All-Stars and others. Ticket packages are $25 (students), $50 (out-of-state attendees), and $250 (patrons).

Prior to Hurricane Katrina, the New Orleans Jewish community consisted of about 9,500 people. It is believed that about 75 per cent suffered severe damage to their homes and that less than 50 per cent have returned to the area.

Other sponsors of the festival are Moment Magazine and the Jewish Federation of Greater New Orleans. For details, visit the websites www.hiddurmitzvah.org or www.howlin-wolf.com.

Medical History in Jerusalem: "Materia Medica in the History of Jerusalem," a permanent exhibition of traditional medical remedies used in the region over the last 3,000 years, opened recently in the main lobby of Shaare Zedek Medical Center in Jerusalem.

The exhibition consists of five displays representing the First and Second Temple eras, the Byzantine and early Arab period, the Mamlukite period, the 19th century, and the period after Shaare Zedek's founding in 1902. An estimated 15,000 people pass through Shaare Zedek's lobby each week.

Eilat Underwater Photography: A first prize of $10,000 and two additional prizes of $3,000 each should attract flocks of amateur and professional photographers, working with either film or digital cameras, to the SanDisk 2006 Red Sea Underwater Photo Competition, to be held in Eilat from April 24 to 29.

The contest is open to photographers from around the world, who may submit underwater photos shot at any time and from any location. "The last competition received a great deal of attention among underwater photographers and divers from around the world," said David Pilosof, the competition's originator. "We expect even more entrants and press coverage this year due to the larger prizes."

Co-sponsors of the event include Isrotel and the Israeli Ministry of Tourism. For more details, phone 972-9-745-7055 or visit the website www.sandiskredsea.com

POPULAR CHILDREN'S BOOK HANA'S SUITCASE ADAPTED FOR STAGE

Hana's Suitcase, the multi-award-winning best-selling children's book by Karen Levine, is set to premiere next month as a stage play at Toronto's Lorraine Kimsa Theatre for Young People (LKTYP). The playwright is Emil Sher, who called the theatre's artistic director, Allen MacInnis, with a proposal for dramatizing the story just as MacInnis had put the book down with the same idea. "Clearly, we were meant to be working together on this extraordinary project," MacInnis said.

Hana's Suitcase relates the true story of a young Jewish brother and sister who lived in Czechoslovakia during the Nazi occupation, and the group of Japanese schoolchildren who, decades later, yearned to know more about the girl, Hana Brady, whose name and birthdate were painted on an old battered suitcase provided by the Auschwitz Museum.

Employing a cast of eight, the play uses multimedia and other innovative staging techniques, and alternates between two time-frames: Tokyo in 2000 and Czechoslovakia in the 1930s and '40s.

A producer for CBC Radio, Levine first heard of the story from The CJN. Her radio documentary on the subject drew an immense response, inspiring her to expand the tale into a children's book. Published by Second Story Press of Toronto, the book has won 16 awards, been translated into many languages and sold more than 250,000 copies internationally. A television documentary, feature-length documentary and two films based on Hana's Suitcase are now also in the works.

Recommended for ages 10 and up, Hana's Suitcase premieres on LKTYP's Mainstage on March 9 and runs through April 23. Previews start March 4. $20-$15. 416 862-2222. www.lktyp.ca

Chai Tea Documentary: The next Chai Tea event of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival features Diameter of the Bomb, a documentary about a suicide bomb in Jerusalem in 2002. Equal parts thriller and mystery, the film follows Israeli police, secret service and military as they try to prevent the attack and track down the terrorist cell behind it. Sheppard Grande, Yonge and Sheppard. $15 in advance or at the door. Sunday, Feb. 26. Chai Tea 4 p.m., film 5 p.m. 416-324-9121, www.tjff.com

* * *

Names in the News: Former Toronto poet Yerra Sugarman, a university writing instructor in New York, participated recently in "A Hundred Years of Henry Roth," a program of the New York Public Library. She and writers Gary Giddens and Cynthia Ozick read excerpts from Roth's novels; Daphne Merkin, Jonathan Rosen and other scribes spoke about Roth's literary contributions, including his classic novel Call It Sleep; and Roth's son, Hugh, and several close associates of the late author offered reminiscences.

Arts in Brief

• Hal Niedzviecki launches the Vintage Canada paperback version of his novel The Program, which focuses on the world of advertising guru Maury Stern. Author Lee Gowan also reads from his novel The Last Cowboy. This Ain't The Rosedale Library, 483 Church St., upstairs. Sunday, Feb. 26, 7:30 p.m.

• The Toronto Jewish Film Festival hosted five free screenings of the acclaimed feature documentary Paper Clips last week for an estimated 1,300 students around Toronto. The film tells the inspiring story of a school project in Tennessee to collect six million paper clips to represent the number of people lost in the Holocaust. The film was shown at Cummer Middle School, Harbord Collegiate, St. Joseph's College, Dublin Heights, Armour Heights and United Synagogue Day School.

At the Galleries: Toronto artist Rochelle Rubinstein, a child of Holocaust survivors, is one of two contemporary artists included in "Unnatural Disasters," an exhibition at the McMaster Museum of Art that surveys acts of genocide, injustice, war, rampage and other upheavals as depicted by various artists since the Renaissance. Goya, Durer, Kollwitz and the late Polish-Canadian painter Gershon Ishkowitz are among the others chosen for the show, which is on view through Feb. 26.

Rubinstein's pieces include embroidered prints on silk of aerial views of Auschwitz, 9/11, the tsunami and post-Katrina New Orleans; a mixed-media book-work in English and Hebrew called Lamentations; and a series of life-sized woodblock prints of anonymous villagers, printed and quilted on fabric.

Ingrid Mayrhofer, assistant curator, expressed delight at including the works of Rubinstein and contemporary artist Oscar de las Flores in the show. Rubinstein "appropriates impersonal images from the public domain, such as the Internet," Mayrhofer said, noting that her art attempts "to process unacceptable [too threatening] visual information as derived from newspapers, books and family stories."

Another Holocaust-related piece to be included is the Ishkowitz watercolour Buchenwald, one of many borrowed works from McMaster's permanent Herman H. Levy Collection. McMaster Museum of Art, 1280 Main St. W., Hamilton, 905-525-9140.

Nutcracker Suite was a turning point for Toronto-born ballerina

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rachel Fox, a member of the English National Ballet's corps de ballet, has been dancing since she was three years old.

"My parents were really keen to have all [four of] their children active," the 21-year-old recalled recently on a trip to her native Toronto to visit her family.

The busy youngster, who attended Associated Hebrew Schools until she was 11, also took gymnastics and piano, and was involved in Girl Guides.

Rachel Fox

By age eight, she had started to devote more of her time to dance. One Sunday morning the following year, when her father, Harry – an accountant who has since retired – was driving her to Yiddish class, Fox heard about children's auditions for the National Ballet School on a CBC radio program.

She quickly wrote down the number, and told her mother, Helen, now principal of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, that she "really wanted to try.

Although Fox wasn't accepted on her first try, she entered the prestigious school, which combines dance training with academics, at age 11. She graduated in 2002 with the Governor General's Award for the highest grade point average in her class.

Leaving her Jewish day school involved some internal struggle. "I was really into Jewish studies... and my bat mitzvah was coming up," she said.

The only Jewish member and one of only two Canadians in her 64-member company, Fox enjoys her new milieu. London is "a great place to be" with much to offer artistically, she said.

She has also performed in Athens and Barcelona as well as several cities in England. Her credits include the Sleeping Beauty, Giselle and Swan Lake in the round. As well, she was a semi-finalist in an international dance competition in Rome last July.

Fox, who enjoys writing in her spare time, left Canada after high school to study at the English National Ballet School. She had already participated in student exchanges in Melbourne and Amsterdam.

After 20 auditions with different companies, she was offered a position with the ENB in 2003. "I don't think it's easy to get into any ballet company," she said. "The ballet world is very small."

For her, she said, ballet has turned out to be what she envisioned.

It was in Grade 7, when Fox's class was part of the cast of the Nutcracker Suite, that something clicked for her. "I remember being on stage [and] realizing it was just what I wanted to do. I really felt like I was in the right place."

Ballet is "a very difficult profession in many different ways," she said. But she is accepting of the restrictions, she added, because "when you get on stage, it's such a great feeling.

"If you are a ballet dancer, 24 hours a day, seven days a week you have to remember that," she said. "Other people my age can go out partying and have a few drinks. They might feel rough the next day, but they can still show up at work. I couldn't do that and go on stage. You have to make sure you have enough sleep, and that you have the right things to eat."

Also, she said, ballerinas have to think about how they present themselves even when they're not on stage.

When she went on birthright israel in 2004, she made sure to eat healthily ("lots of fresh fruit and vegetables"), ran regularly to maintain her fitness, and even went into the hallway to stretch when her hotel room wasn't big enough. "You just do what you have to do. It didn't deter me from having a good time."

She emphasized the importance of "the journey" – always striving to improve professionally – for anyone who wants to make a career of dance. "If you go in knowing that, and you enjoy the journey, it's a really special profession."

[footprintsphoto.com photos]

Ballet may be a difficult profession, but for Rachel Fox, of the English National Ballet, being on stage is "such a great feeling."

Convergence of young prodigies

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

An acclaimed mix of young musical prodigies will converge in North York on March 4 in the second annual Young Stars of the Young Century gala concert.

The 10 artists, who range in age from seven to 20, will perform both solos and operatic choruses written by such greats as Mozart and Tchaikovsky.

Featured instruments will include the piano, trumpet, violin, flute and a special Russian folk instrument called the dorma.

For the grand finale, the artists will join together with the Canadian Children's Opera Chorus, singing a famous Russian tune.

"The feedback and energy you get from working with young, talented kids is not comparable to anything else," she says.

"They give everything they have to the audience."

David Lakirovich

Hailing from such places as Armenia, China and Canada, the performers have all won national or international awards and many have recorded albums.

"I'm obviously honoured to play," says the virtuoso, who is a Grade 11 student at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, and practises four hours every day.

"It's not even about the violin. It's about being together with these musicians."

In the week leading up to the concert, the musicians will perform in Montreal, Ottawa, Brampton and Huntsville.

They will also give a charity concert and share their talents with peers at performing arts schools.

"For other kids who see people the same age as them who have already achieved so much…it's really inspirational," says Dvoretskaia.

Following the Toronto event, the group will go to New York's renowned Lincoln Center.

The Toronto event is affiliated with the Vladimir Spivakov Foundation, which grants scholarships to young artists and raises funds for critically ill children.

Proceeds from the concert will go towards the Hospital for Sick Children assisted by financial contributions from Alex and Simona Shnaider.

Dvoretskaia, the North American representative for the Vladimir Spivakov Foundation, says the charity component of the tour is dynamic.

"What's very unique about this project is that not only are these kids coming here to perform concerts, but they are doing charity work," she says.

The impresario hopes to make the annual concert even bigger and more international next year.

"Hopefully, for the next year, we're going to expand and bring bright young stars from Israel," she says.

The concert will take place at George Weston Recital Hall in Toronto's Centre for Performing Arts.

Tickets can be obtained through ticketmaster at 416-870-8000 or www.ticketmaster.ca. For more information about the concert and performers, log onto www.showoneproductions.com or call 416-737-6785.

Feminist's 'obsessing' over weight gain leads to a play

By KYLE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Eve Ensler, author of the international phenomenon The Vagina Monologues, is returning to the stage with her new play The Good Body.

"I woke up one day and discovered I had a not-so-flat, post-40 stomach and I was appalled," Ensler said.

As a radical feminist, Ensler wanted to understand how she could strongly believe in women's rights and empowerment and at the same time be fixated on her body.

"I couldn't believe how many hours I was spending obsessing and dieting," she said.

Ensler began writing a journal to her stomach to determine what was going on inside it. "It was very instructive. It just began to teach me a lot about myself," she said.

On a personal journey to accept her less-than-flat stomach, Ensler travelled to Rio de Janeiro, Mumbai, Moscow, Beverly Hills, New York, South Africa and Rome, where she asked women "What do you think of yourself – do you like your body, do you like your stomach?"

Eve Ensler

The Good Body is based on the conversations Ensler had with women around the world about their bodies. That includes Helen Gurley Brown, author and editor of Cosmopolitan magazine; actress Isabella Rossellini, a former model; a 40- plus Jewish woman from Los Angeles; and a 74-year-old African woman.

The majority of women Ensler spoke to believed that if they changed one part of their body everything else would work out.

"I realized that everywhere I went, it didn't matter what country I was in, women were driven to be 'good,'" she said.

The Good Body is Ensler's attempt to redefine the word "good," to step off the capitalist treadmill and encourage women to find a way to survive without being flat or perfect.

"'Good' isn't polite, quiet, behaved, thin, disappeared and non-existent. It might be radical, wild and outrageous. To be able to work with opposites and encompass everything and be fully alive with that rather than just being 'good,'" she said.

Ensler encourages all women, especially young girls, to strive for greatness, to be better than "good."

"You have to make a decision if you want to be good or you want to be great. If you opt to be great, you will lie down at night and you will know that you were living the life you were meant to live and no one can take that away from you," Ensler said.

At 52, Ensler has finally accepted her body. "I really like my body now. Not for vain reasons like 'oh, I look so fabulous.' But, 'I have just come to appreciate my body,'" she said.

"I am so grateful that I'm travelling around the globe, that I'm doing eight shows a week and that I'm not getting sick. It's so generous. How can we not like these bodies that we were given?"

Slalom skier to represent Israel at Olympics

By SHIMRIT BERMAN
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — A little piece of Israeli history will be written next week in the Italian ski resort of Sestriere, some 100 kilometres west of Turin, where the 2006 Winter Olympics started last week.

On Feb. 20, when skiers line up at the top of the Giovanni Angelli slope for the alpine ski slalom races, one from Israel will be among the competitors for the first time in the nation's history.

Michael Renzhin has only been in Israel for 4½ years, but he has been skiing for more than 20. His father, a skiing coach, taught him how to ski when he was just three years old, and at 13, Renzhin had already decided on a competitive career. Now 28, he hasn't stopped yet.

Born in Latvia but raised in a small town in the Ukrainian Carpathians, Michael was a member of the Ukrainian national team for six years before moving to Israel.

"I decided to stop racing for Ukraine because I was always ranked third, and only the top two got to go to competitions and training camps abroad," he explained.

But he didn't come to Israel for an opportunity to compete internationally. If at all, he thought the decision meant the end of his skiing career.

But life had other plans for him.

"When I decided to come to Israel, I didn't think I'd still be skiing," he recalled. "But when I was preparing all the required documents prior to my arrival, the Jewish Agency in Ukraine contacted the Israeli ski federation and that's how we found each other."

It turned out to be quite a successful arrangement. Michael achieved what he had always dreamed of – qualifying for the Olympic Games, where he will compete in the slalom and giant slalom races – and the Israeli ski federation will finally see an Israeli skier in the Olympics.

To qualify for the games, Renzhin had to achieve the international federation criterion of less than 140 points, as well as the much tougher Israeli criterion of less than 65 points in any competition he took part in. The points are calculated on the basis of time difference from the race winner.

"We've had more athletes competing in the world championships since 1993, so we've gotten better," said Stanley Rubinstein, honorary chairman of the Israeli ski federation. "Also, having Michael there can give us some exposure, although there is quite a bit of exposure to ski in Israel already. Maybe it will give some exposure to the competitive side of the sport."

> 'We have snow here ... it's not Jamaica'

For Renzhin it's more personal. He is at a loss for words before he finally said, "I'm delighted to be going to the Olympics. It's every athlete's biggest dream. But it's more than that. It's representing Israel, and I'm even happier to be the first one to do it.

"I feel it, but I'm trying not to think about it. I don't want it to distract me. I'm trying to think about the here and now, and not about how important it is."

Ironically, due to his intense skiing career, Michael has hardly spent any time in Israel since his arrival. In fact, he spends so little time in the Jewish state that he doesn't even have his own place – while in Israel, he stays at the Wingate Institute.

"I'm here for about three months every year. I have competitions stretched from December to April, and then there are training camps abroad, too. Last summer, the Israeli team, senior and junior, practiced in Argentina and Chile. It was really good."

Renzhin's family still resides in Ukraine and he claims it's more convenient that way, since he travels around Europe a lot of the time.

"I think that when I stop skiing, they'll move to Israel, too."

Even though he doesn't get to spend a lot of time in Israel, he did endure one of the most intense Israeli experiences – military service, even if only symbolically. Since he arrived in Israel at 24 and had already served two years in the Ukrainian army at 18, his IDF service was reduced to 39 days.

"It was just doing basic training all over again. The only difference was the M-16 instead of the Kalashnikov," he said.

Renzhin now speaks fluent Hebrew, and he attributes his command of the language to his ulpan teacher, but adds that "we also speak Hebrew in the national team."

The current team consists of three men and one woman, and together they experience the gruelling routine of a competitive skier.

"We have around 45 competitions per season," Renzhin explained. "Every competition day is very long, and when we don't compete we have to prepare our equipment. The big stars have people to do it for them, but we do it ourselves. We have our weekends off, but usually there isn't enough time during the weekdays to work on our equipment, so we do it then."

The Israeli team only trains abroad. "We can never know when it's going to snow on Mount Hermon, so we have to practice abroad," Rubinstein explained, referring to Israel's only ski resort.

Despite fickle skiing conditions, Rubinstein insisted the sport is popular among Israelis. The history of skiing in Israel, he said, goes back to the days of the British mandate, when the Palestine ski club was established.

"It was also popular in the 1950s, but it really blossomed after the Six Day War. There were no cable cars at Mount Hermon at the time, so people would climb the mountain riding mules."

"I happen to talk to a lot of people about skiing in Israel," said Renzhin, "and I'm surprised to find out how much they know about skiing. I don't know where they get all the information."

Funding and practice of the sport is limited to non-existent in Israel, which is part of a group of small nations – including Cyprus, Portugal, Monaco and Ireland – who have similar problems. Nonetheless, the Israeli ski federation often provides help for the ski federations of some North African countries.

"We mostly help them with equipment and arranging training sessions," said Rubinstein. Even though Israel is not the only country with competitive skiers and no practicing conditions, non-Israelis are often surprised to find out it's possible to ski in Israel.

"We tell them that we have snow here, and a mountain. It's not Jamaica. It's very easy to get ski equipment here. But it's still interesting to see Israelis ski. It's not like seeing someone from Austria ski," Renzhin said. "But we tell people Israelis ski, abroad and on the Hermon."

Though Renzhin takes pride in being Israel's only skiing option, he has never actually skied there himself.

"There is snow there for two months or so, so I guess it's possible to practice there a little, but that period of time always overlaps with my competitions abroad, and I must compete. That's why I haven't done it yet," he explained. "But I will."

The Muslim world desperately needs a free press

ARTS IN FOCUS
BY OREN SHEFA

Yet another clash between Western ideas and Islamist dogma has once again raised tensions throughout the world.

Last September, the Danish newspaper Morgenavisen Jyllands-Posten published a collection of 12 satirical depictions of the Muslim Prophet Muhammad. Recently, those images found their way into other European and Arabic newspapers, sparking a furor throughout the Muslim world.

According to Muslim sharia law, it is expressly forbidden for the image of Muhammad to be represented in any form, regardless of the intention.

In an apology, Jyllands-Posten's editor-in-chief Carsten Juste expressed regret that the illustrations were taken out of context and said that the images, which he called "sober," were part of an "initiative [that] was taken as part of an ongoing public debate on freedom of expression."

As the Jyllands-Posten cartoons reached a wider audience, the world has watched with increasing horror as radical Islamists have threatened Denmark and the rest of the western world with financial sanctions, boycotts and bombings, and as mobs have stormed embassies and burned flags.

While most agree that the newspaper's decision to publish cartoons that insult an entire religion was in extremely poor taste, the real tragedy is that many of those who were deeply and justifiably hurt by the paper's insensitivity have had the satisfaction of a formal apology ruined by the disproportionate responses of these radicals.

In a show of solidarity, European papers such as France Soir and Die Welt have stood firmly behind Jyllands-Posten under the banner of freedom of expression, while the European Union said the boycott of Danish goods violates world trade rules.

Freedom of expression is an immensely important democratic principle. In a democratic state, the knowledge that citizens have the power to question policies and ideologies is the single greatest defence against tyranny. However, as in the Jyllands-Posten case, this liberty has occasionally conflicted with cultural sensitivities.

With tensions between the Muslim world and the West running nervously high, many are desperately calling for cooler heads to prevail.

In an official statement released by the International Federation of Journalists (IFJ), the group's general secretary, Aidan White, warned, "These are dangerous times for community relations and media have to tread carefully, but they must not compromise fundamental principles as they do so." He added that this "is an ethical issue which must be discussed, debated and resolved by journalists. Governments should keep their hands out of the newsroom and stop interfering."

Indeed, interference with the media by autocratic Islamic leaders is part of the problem. Journalistic freedom in predominantly Muslim nations such as Saudi Arabia, Indonesia and Iran is simply non-existent, and a free press would go a long way toward allaying the huge amount of mistrust and animosity toward the West among Muslims. Right now, even moderate Muslims in these countries are being radicalized by the inaccurate and inflammatory messages they get from state-controlled media.

It is, therefore, more important than ever for non-governmental organizations such as the IFJ, among others, to push aggressively for a free and open press in the Islamic world.

The time for walking on eggshells has passed, and in its place should be a real sense of urgency. Today a handful of tasteless and completely inappropriate cartoons have led to heated rhetoric, the destruction of property and even the loss of life.

If things continue along this path, tomorrow's grievances could bring about an even more unsettling state of affairs.

And the readers' winners are...

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

The red carpet was rolled out along the Bathurst corridor earlier this month as the Yasher Koach Awards (YKAs) were metaphorically presented in a previous column (Feb. 2) to some Jewish community members who contributed significantly to the growth of the Toronto Jewish community in 2005/5765/6.

I gave a YKA to Rabbi Debra Landsberg of Temple Emanu-El for being the only rabbi in 2005/5765/6 whose water broke (she gave birth to triplets). My mistake. A reader contacted me to say: "Not to detract from Rabbi Debra Landsberg's accomplishment, but she was not the only spiritual leader to give birth in 2005. Rabbi Tina Grimberg of Congregation Darchei Noam probably was the first to do so. Her son David Avraham was born Jan. 9, 2005."

Therefore, there is a tie in the category of [illegible] Motherhood between Rabbi Landsberg and Rabbi Grimberg. Mazel tov.

Another reader wrote: "This is brilliant. Maybe one day [the YKAs] could be come a reality. In the meantime, I nominate Bill Stern, who works tirelessly to promote Yiddish culture. I also nominate Heather Freed, a big-hearted volunteer who devotes much time to Na'amat, and Susan Brown, an artist and teacher who took over the list of a burial committee from her father and has since used her time visiting cemeteries to produce art that will be shown at the Market Gallery in April."

The reader also stated: "On a personal note, thank you for mentioning Simon Kalkstein. I've known him since we were teenagers. When I won the privilege of writing a tribute song for Irving Layton, Simon helped me. I'm sure the great reception the song received was because Simon's brilliance shone through the words and gave a blessing to the music."

A third reader nominated the following couple for a YKA: "Zale and Rachael Newman, for their acceptance of everyone, and for their open home and dedication to klal Yisrael. Zale and Rachel work on so many charitable projects that they hardly have any time for themselves."

I received an e-mail from a Jewish community member who enthusiastically nominated Koren Kassirer for a YKA. The person wrote: "It is with the greatest of honour that I nominate a woman who has touched not only the hearts but perhaps more importantly the souls of many in our small community [of Oshawa/Whitby/Bowmanville]: Koren Kassirer. She's a gitte neshamah, a balabuste – and that's tough being a vegetarian – and an inspiration, particularly to our children, youth and young at heart. I nominate her for most Inspiring Bat Mitzvah Teacher; for being a profound role model for whom Judaism lives and breathes and sings; and for Most Rockin' Hebrew Teacher – she is adored by her students.

"In addition, I nominate her for Best Havdalah service – no one does Havdalah like our Koren – and for Most Creative Purchase of a Torah. Koren's purchase of a Torah on e-Bay is a local legend. Sunday nights at the Kassirer home brought together mothers and their post-bat mitzvah daughters to learn, create and kibbitz. Quilts from our Judaica art group, to give one example, were completed and sent to cancer patients. I also nominate her for Best Guitarist in the Bowmanville Klezmer Band. (OK, there is no Bowmanville Klezmer Band, but if there was...)"

Of course there are countless community members who deserve Yasher Koach Awards, but the season has come and gone.

We look forward to next year, however, when this coveted award will once again be presented to the inspired, and to those who inspire, as well as to the humble, high profile and just plain hometown, groundbreaking Jews.

A problem of timing, not substance

By HERB KEINON

Analysis
Israel and the Palestinians

Israeli policymakers would have had a devil of a time dealing with a Hamas victory in the Palestinian Legislative Council elections even in the best of times – even if Prime Minister Ariel Sharon were healthy and at the helm, and the government robust and in the middle of its term.

But the fact that critical decisions about Israel's ties to the Palestinian Authority need to be made now, in the heat of an election campaign, just makes the decision-making process that much more difficult. Matters are complicated even further considering that acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert is less experienced and confident than the man whose place he is taking.

In other words, domestic electoral considerations are affecting critical decisions about a Hamas-led PA that are being made now.

National Security Council head Giora Eiland told the cabinet Sunday that he had no problem with the steps the cabinet approved, including ending

Russia will try to influence Hamas, ambassador tells The CJN

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

Georgiy Mamedov has been Russia's ambassador to Canada since 2003, but the 59-year-old diplomat, who also served for many years as Russia's deputy foreign minister, is a veteran of the old Soviet Union and has been in contact with the Canadian Jewish community on several occasions.

Mamedov sat down with The CJN earlier this month at the Russian consulate in Montreal to discuss his country's turn to chair the Group of Eight (G-8) summit this July in St. Petersburg, as well as other issues, among them terrorism, the Middle East, and the challenges faced by his country.

CJN: It's interesting, Mr. Ambassador, that you chose to sit down with The CJN.

Georgiy Mamedov: Last year, when I came down and saw my friends at the Holocaust Museum (in Montreal), we discussed how we could use the chairmanship of Russia in G-8 to fight against terrorism, against suicide bombing. Russia's agenda is already crowded: energy, gas and oil are always in your face. Pandemics, fighting infectious diseases, bird flu. And education – without education you will have relapses of anti-Semitism and terrible things will happen to the generations to come. My role as ambassador to Canada is not only to promote bilateral relations, but to see what Russia and Canada jointly

CANADA

Campaign Sets Record

WINNIPEG — Winnipeg's Combined Jewish Appeal campaign has surpassed its goal and set a new record. The drive still has a month to go. CJA had raised $4.8 million as of Feb. 1, after passing its $4.65-million goal on Dec. 21. The campaign ends March 31. Director Elaine Goldstine said the strong showing means there should be $250,000 extra to give to more than a dozen beneficiary agencies. This year's marketing included billboard and bus bench advertising, as well as free TV ads and free ads in the Winnipeg Free Press and National Post. The TV spots featured free material from United Jewish Communities that was modified for a Winnipeg audience, Goldstine told the Jewish Post & News.

Israeli Extradited

TORONTO — Canada last week extradited an Israeli man who had spent the last 18 months in the country and is wanted in Israel on charges of sexually assaulting teenage boys and girls. Vitali Libshin, 46, of Ashdod, was handed over through Interpol. Israeli police suspect Libshin of links to Shimon Ben Tuv, a Kiryat Arba resident who is serving 16 years in jail for sex crimes against children from 1998 to 2004, Ha'aretz reported.

WORLD

Jungle Jews Get Rabbi

LIMA — The Jews of Tarapoto, in Peru's jungle region some 600 kilometres north of Lima, got a new Spanish-speaking rabbi this month. The community has several hundred descendants of Moroccan Jews who came to the area in the late 1800s. "Assimilation and intermarriage took a heavy toll on [those] who chose to remain," said Michael Freund, head of Shavei Israel, the group that sent the rabbi. "Now, however, their children, grandchildren and even great-grandchildren have begun to return to their Jewish roots." The well-organized community includes doctors, lawyers and academics.

Vandals Hit Shul

CHICAGO — Vandals painted swastikas and anti-Semitic phrases on a Chicago shul last week. Police are conducting a hate-crime investigation into the Feb. 13 incident at Agudas Achim North Shore Congregation, the Chicago Tribune reported. The graffiti included "Mein Kampf," "Kill the Jews" and "White Power."

Aid Depends On Hamas, PM Tells Abbas

OTTAWA — Prime Minister Stephen Harper spoke by phone last week with PA President Mahmoud Abbas and repeated Canada's commitment to a Palestinian state, but he said Hamas must renounce violence and recognize Israel.

"Canada remains committed to the goal of a comprehensive, just and lasting peace in the Middle East, and the creation of a sovereign and viable Palestinian state living side by side in peace and security with Israel," Harper said.

"Future assistance to any new Palestinian government will be reviewed against that government's commitment to the principles of non-violence, recognition of Israel and acceptance of previous agreements and obligations, including the [internationally sponsored 'road map' peace plan]," Harper added, noting that Ottawa "will continue to review the situation on an ongoing basis."

Muslims Polled On Jews

LONDON — Thirty-seven per cent of British Muslims see British Jewry as a "legitimate target as part of the struggle for justice in the Middle East," a new poll found. More than half the 500 Muslims surveyed also believe U.K. Jews exert too much influence on British foreign policy, the London Jewish Chronicle reported.

Terror Victims Meet

MADRID — Victims and relatives of victims of terror attacks, including Israelis, gathered in Valencia, Spain, last week. Hundreds arrived Feb. 13 for the two-day conference, which aimed to give terror victims a support network and draw attention to their needs.

Contest Launched

TEHRAN — Iran's largest newspaper launched a competition for cartoons satirizing the Holocaust. Hamshahri issued a call in English for submissions last week on its website, saying entries can focus on "looting and crimes perpetrated by the United States and Israel as well as alleged historical events like the Holocaust." Entry deadline is May 5. The prize is $140 (US) in gold. The contest comes after Iran's president made widely censured statements denying the Shoah.

Art To Be Returned

VIENNA — A painting looted during the Nazi era will be returned to the heirs of its original owner. On Feb. 13, the Joanneum Museum in Graz, Austria, said it would return Egon Schiele's 1907 Harbor of Trieste, but offered no further details on the exchange. Last month, a court ruled that five paintings by Gustav Klimt must be returned to Maria Altmann, an heir of the family that owned them before the Nazi takeover of Austria.

BJCC to get new name, new look

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The "central square" project of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT) endeavour – that is, the redevelopment of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre site – received a major donation last week that will facilitate the building of a new Jewish community centre to replace the BJC.

Martin Prosserman – the founder and CEO of clothing manufacturer and retailer Moores the Suit People, until he sold the company a few years ago – and his family have made "a very large donation," said federation spokesperson Howard English. The new facility will be known as the Prosserman Family Jewish Community Centre.

Prosserman Family Jewish Community Centre

It will be built on BJCC land, and then the existing building will eventually be torn down, said English.

The central square project will have four "anchors," English said. In addition to the BJCC, there will be a new Koffler Centre for the Arts; a centre for Jewish knowledge and heritage, to be named for the Latner family; and a renovated and expanded Lipa Green Building.

The Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre, the Albert and Temmy Latner Jewish Public Library, the Ontario Jewish Archives and Jewish Information Service of Greater Toronto – all of which are currently housed in the Lipa Green building – will move to the Latner Centre for Jewish Knowledge and Heritage.

The Latner Centre will "not only provide the facilities of its constituent entities, but will run a comprehensive range of programs across the Toronto area," said English.

A new theatre is to be located immediately adjacent to the main atrium of the new Koffler Centre so that the atrium can double as a foyer of pre-function space, said Peter Cohen, chair of the Central Square development committee.

Extra space created in the Lipa Green Building will be used by UJA Federation. "We're short of space now," English said.

The recent donation does not mean that the $120-million project will proceed ahead of schedule, he noted.

"Subject to all municipal approvals and the successful completion of the fundraising initiative, we anticipate starting construction about a year from now, and it should take approximately 30 months to complete the project," Cohen said.

The JTT project also includes the new community campus being built at Bathurst Street and Weldrick Avenue in Richmond Hill, as well as the recent redevelopment of the Miles Nadal JCC and the building of the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, which opened in 2004.

Cartoon controversy continues in Calgary

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Richard Bronstein knows he's at the centre of controversy in the province of Alberta over his decision to have his newspaper, the Jewish Free Press (JFP), publish four of the Danish cartoons that have angered much of the Muslim world.

He's read the news reports that a Calgary Islamic group, the Islamic Supreme Council of Canada (ISCC), has laid a complaint to the Alberta Human Rights Commission about his newspaper and the Western Standard magazine, which also reproduced the cartoons. He's also read that police have asked the province's special prosecutor to examine whether there are grounds for laying a hate promotion charge under the Criminal Code.

Bronstein, publisher of the JFP, has yet to hear from the human rights commission or from the public prosecutor directly. His only connection to police came when he turned over to them a phone recording of a death threat from a man with a noticeable eastern European accent who warned him to watch his back.

Greater Toronto Area

Along ancient paths, today

In ancient times, the uncommonly beautiful and geographically rare Dead Sea area held a special attraction for kings, vacationers and wayfarers alike. Even then, the special qualities of the mineral salts that the oblong, turquoise lake washed up on its shores were known throughout the area.

Today, the attraction is not any less. Indeed, one could say, the attraction is even greater when one adds the considerable archeological demarcations to the spectacular ochres, browns and beiges of the rock formations that typify the area's topography.

Thus, on a cool, windy day in Jerusalem last month, I travelled as a guest of the Ministry of Tourism with my guide, Ziv Cohen, down to the fabled Sea of Salt (Yam Hamelach, the Dead Sea). I use the word "down" because after we reached the eastern-most boundary of the hills of Jerusalem, we immediately began a southeasterly descent through the stark, wind-swept wilderness of Judea that culminated at the lowest spot on the planet Earth – the Dead Sea.

Like most good Israeli nature and tour guides, Cohen was able to connect countless intersecting points of the Land's history, geography, climatology, botany, zoology and, of course, theology, too. The constantly changing scenery that lay just beyond the window of our car provided the classrooms for my instruction.

The first stop along our journey was the nature reserve at Einot Tzukim (literally, the water springs of the cliffs). In Arabic, its name is Ein Feshkha, (literally the water springs from the cracks in the rocks.) A lush, fresh-water spring that lies hidden among tamarisks, reeds, bulrushes and thick shrubs off the northwest shore of the Dead Sea, it owes its existence to the shifting of geological plates during prehistoric times.

From Ein Tzukot, we continued south, deeper into the desert. The red-crusted Mountains of Edom rose in the east past the far side of the lake like giant walnut shells worn down by wind and time.

As we drove, we saw the cliffs and rocky slopes on our right, to the west, that increasingly bear the scars of nature's vast erosive powers as if scraped and carved by monstrous tools.

After more than half an hour, we arrived at the incongruously verdant and luxuriant oasis, now nature reserve, of Ein Gedi.

Already mentioned in the Book of Samuel as the place where the young David sought refuge from King Saul, its cliffs, wadis, fresh water, dense tropical plants and interesting wildlife are a hiker's dream.

In biblical times, Ein Gedi was renowned for its rich agricultural yields of dates, vines, aromatic plants and medicinal herbs. The Song of Songs makes special reference to Ein Gedi. Its agricultural treasures were highly sought by Romans, Egyptians and Greeks.

Merely paces away from the pavement of the highway, we walked into another world, a corridor of high craggy stone walls that led us into a sylvan space of time present and time past. We walked further into the wadi, hearing only the sound of our shoes scraping the rock, or the chirping of the small black birds flying nearby.

It was cool, damp and windy in Jerusalem, but under the mid-morning sky of the mid-Judean desert, the sun poured its comforting warmth all over us as we walked, climbed and marvelled at nature's fine beauty.

Many readers of The CJN have probably been there. Therefore, not a great deal need be written in this space about that unbelievable mountain fortress.

Massada, in Hebrew, is a variation of the word fortress. Thus, nominally, literally and actually, the place is a fortress. It is a bloc of mountain that stands alone, carved by God and by man into something more long-lasting than its geology and more significant than its uncrushable rock.

They exist of course, but I imagine very few are the places on earth as utterly awe-inspiring and humbling as the remnant of the northern palace of Massada. The vista from the high plateau of the mountain seizes the imagination. Only the wind speaks. All else is silent.

Five years ago, Massada was recognized by UNESCO as a world heritage site, warranting protection and safekeeping for the benefit of all humanity.

From the summit of the mountain, some 450 metres above the Dead Sea, I could see more clearly than ever before, no matter where I looked.

By now, morning had rolled into afternoon. The sun continued to shine on us without interference. But we were hungry.

We descended the mountain in the cool comfort of the cable car on the fortress' eastern side.

Our destination was the Crowne Plaza Dead Sea Hotel for lunch. The hotel was overflowing with visitors, and we enjoyed a sumptuous lunch from a multi-selection buffet of delicious, uniquely Israeli Mediterranean fare.

We let our meal settle, relaxed, comfortable, grateful and very happy, while sitting on lounge chairs on the shore of the sea that had brought us south for the day from Jerusalem. –MBD

SPECIAL VISITOR TO ISRAEL

The Dalai Lama was in Israel last week for his fourth visit there. The Tibetan Buddhist leader-in-exile and Nobel Prize peace laureate spoke to several groups, and met with Israel's Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yonah Metzger, Sephardi Chief Rabbi Shlomo Amar and Muslim religious leaders. He was honoured with the Notable of the Negev Award from Ben-Gurion University for his work on behalf of human rights. Here, the Dalai Lama speaks at the Habn Theatre in Jerusalem as a guest of Shatil, the operational arm of the New Israel Fund in Israel, a non-governmental organization concerned with issues of human and civil rights, social and economic justice, and religious pluralism. The Dalai Lama did not meet with government officials on this visit because of Israel's sensitivity to the Chinese government on the subject of Tibet.

JF&CS head is new but he's no newcomer

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The new executive director of Jewish Family & Child Service, Richard Cummings, may be new to his job, but he's anything but a newcomer to the organization.

Cummings, a Montreal native who has a PhD in education from the University of Toronto, was a member of the JF&CS board of directors for 15 years and is also a past president of that body.

"My experience as president was one of the most gratifying experiences. [The organization] has always had a strong place in my heart," said Cummings, 52, who for 12 years was executive director of Integra, a children's mental health centre serving children and adolescents with learning disabilities.

He first became "intrigued" with JF&CS, after his wife Joanne, a psychologist with the Hospital for Sick Children, became involved with the agency's Jerome D. Diamond Adolescent Centre and became a member of the JF&CS board.

"I had backed off from volunteer work while I was working on my PhD, but when I was ready, I knew that this would be a meaningful way to volunteer."

When the position of executive director recently became available, he said, "I realized it was a special opportunity for me to integrate my Jewishness with my desire for having an impact on vulnerable people and their families."

Richard Cummings

Cummings replaces Ron Levin, who left JF&CS in August for personal reasons.

"[This opportunity] came at the right time. I was passionate about my work in mental health, but I needed a change. Being at JF&CS [in a different capacity] would allow me to make a difference at a different level," Cummings said.

"I'm closer to the ground now. I'm experiencing the nuts and bolts of the agency."

One of his biggest responsibilities as he starts his new job, he said, is to ensure that the agency has the resources necessary to provide excellent services.

"We need to tell the story that [to invest in JF&CS is to invest in the future.] We need to support [the agency] in its work with those living in poverty in the Jewish community.

"People still think that there is no poverty in the community, but as of 2001, of the approximately 180,000 Jewish people in the Greater Toronto Area, about 20,000 are living at or below the poverty line. That does not include the working poor, whose income is above Statistics Canada's poverty line. That is a significant percentage."

Poverty is a predictor of many kinds of difficulties, said Cummings. "Stress and feelings of helplessness contribute to family disfunction, marital problems and family violence. These are the risks that accompany poverty."

He is proud, he said, to provide support for the Jewish poor along with such agencies as UJA Federation Greater Toronto, the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education and the Jewish Camp Council. "We are partners in a network of services that address their problems."

The agency also has to get the word out to people who need its services. "People need to know that we are available to support them, enrich their lives and resolve difficulties."

He stressed, however, that "we can chip away at the needs of those who experience poverty, but our resources are limited in the face of the dimension of the problem."

Another critical service that needs attention is the women's abuse program, said Cummings. "United Way is a significant funding partner, and it supports us in our group work, but having more staff available for abused women is a priority I look forward to addressing. We need to ensure that there are no holes in the safety net."

With regard to programs for adolescents, he said, funding has not increased in many years. "I'm talking about the support needed for vulnerable adolescents. They are at a high-risk stage of development, and I wish we could do more.

"I would like to see increased services in schools. Supporting staff and students is a way of contributing and sustaining the health of the community."

Often, he said, children's aid societies need to seek support from other organizations when dealing with children and families. "At JF&CS, however, we are all under one tent. We can take a more holistic approach to supporting our community. [Many agencies] look at the model that we present."

Cummings, a member of Holy Blossom Temple and a director of the temple's foundation, said that it's essential to ensure that the agency uses its limited resources to be as effective as possible.

Ont. law passed to ban faith-based arbitration

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

A new provincial law that bans religious family arbitration, and that critics say discriminates against Jews, will be challenged in the courts, promises a lawyer who argued forcefully against the legislation.

Last week's passage of Bill 27, which prohibits all forms of binding arbitration in family matters not conducted according to Canadian law, is "a really sad day" for Jews who look to rabbinic courts, or beit dins, for authority, said John Syrtash.

Syrtash, who represented the Va'ad Harabonim of Toronto and several Orthodox groups in the lead-up to the law's passage, says he will take steps to challenge the measure under the religious freedom provisions of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Unless the law is changed, "we're committed to challenging it in the courts at the first opportunity," he told The CJN.

Besides being possibly illegal, the law shows "complete callousness and indifference" to religious communities that have used internal tribunals to settle family disputes, Syrtash added.

Canadian Jewish Congress, however, says there's still time for the Jewish community to have its say on the law.

"Much of the regulations are still to be determined," said Mark Freiman, honorary legal counsel for CJC's Ontario region. "There's still an opportunity to soften the [law's] impact. We expect to be consulted on the regulations."

A statement from Attorney General Michael Bryant's office said the law will come into effect when the regulations are finalized. "The ministry is working with interested individuals and groups to draft regulations, which are expected in the coming months," it added.

Jewish communal groups say they were ignored in the drafting of the law. Their first chance to speak out on the issue was last month, when Syrtash, CJC and B'nai Brith Canada addressed a legislative committee that heard public submissions in between second and third readings of the legislation.

At the time, Syrtash called the bill "blatantly unfair" and asked for it to be "completely withdrawn."

He warned it would discriminate against Jews, especially the Orthodox, because it targets beit dins, which have been functioning in Ontario without incident since 1889.

Ontario's 1991 Arbitration Act made beit din rulings and those of other private arbitrations legally enforceable in a secular court, provided the parties consented beforehand.

The new law, called the Family Statute Amendment Act, covers only family matters, such as divorce, child custody and division of property.

Jewish communal leaders have noted that it will not affect most of the beit din's rulings, which concern personal and business disputes, nor will it affect the granting of Jewish divorce decrees, or gets.

It will, however, strip beit din rulings in family matters of their legal authority.

And if those rulings have not yet been incorporated into secular divorce settlements, they will become void and reopen old disputes, because the new law has no transitional or grandparenting clauses, according to Syrtash.

The law owes its origins to the heated debate in Ontario over a proposal from a Muslim group to set up tribunals that would employ sharia, or Islamic law, in binding family arbitration.

That led to widespread fear that women would be harshly treated by a legal code that favours men.

Last September, Premier Dalton McGuinty declared that "there will be no religious arbitration in Ontario. There will be one law for all Ontarians."

Bill 27 "demonstrates the McGuinty government's commitment to protecting those who choose to arbitrate their family law matters," Bryant stated. "It means when it comes to family law arbitrations in this province, there is only one law and that is Canadian law."

Indeed, the law states that resolutions "based on other laws and principles – including religious principles – will have no legal effect and will not be enforceable by the courts."

In their submissions to the legislative committee, Jewish groups pointed out that a beit din bases its rulings on Jewish law.

"That's really the crux of it," said Freiman.

The act also requires that family arbitrators be trained and be members of a professional arbitration organization.

Freiman said that doesn't necessarily mean rabbis can't be family arbitrators, just that they must complete additional training.

He called the law "deeply flawed. It presumes that faith-based arbitration is innately exploitative and coercive, and that women are incapable of consenting to have an arbitration based on their religious values. I don't think the Jewish community would accept that."

What should matter, Freiman said, are results, not the process.

The legislative committee examining the bill rejected all of CJC's recommendations, including that faith-based arbitrations not be dismissed if they are compatible with Canadian and Ontario law.

The committee did not explain why it rejected CJC's suggestions.

An irate Syrtash said it's "sad" that McGuinty "felt he had to succumb to political blackmail and mob hysteria" on the sharia issue.

"This is the second time he has shown utter contempt for the Jewish community," the first being when the premier retroactively cancelled the tax credit for students in private schools.

"He takes the Jewish vote for granted. He figures Jews will vote Liberal anyway."

Syrtash said the new law targets Orthodox Jews because they are less likely to feel comfortable in a secular court and seek to keep family disputes private.

Conservative opposition leader John Tory supports the legislation, but said the government should have consulted affected groups, Canadian Press reported.

Freiman and others have noted that the legislation will not protect vulnerable women, who may be forced to seek a religious settlement rather than going to court. In its submission last month, CJC said the law would not eliminate faith-based arbitration but drive it underground.

Police report big drop in hate crimes

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The number of hate crimes reported to police dropped dramatically in 2005, but Jews and blacks remain the most-targeted victim groups, according to the Toronto Police Service's 2005 Annual Hate/Bias Crime Statistical Report.

A total of 132 hate crimes were reported in 2005 – 19 per cent less than the year before – of which 33 involved Jews and 33 involved blacks, the report stated.

"The Jewish community makes up approximately 8.3 per cent of the population in the City of Toronto but was victimized in 84 per cent of total hate crimes against religion," the report found.

Last year's findings marks a continuation of a longer term trend of declining hate crimes, which peaked with 338 incidents in 2001, following the 9/11 attacks. The Toronto Police Service has been compiling hate crimes statistics since 1993 and last year's tally of 132 was the lowest number yet recorded. The hate crimes unit classifies hate crimes – either the wilful promotion of hate or other crimes that were motivated by bias – in several categories, including race, religion, sexual orientation, nationality and multi-bias.

Looking at the data since 1993, the report found that "the most-affected victim groups, both in absolute terms and in their respective categories, have been blacks (race), Jews (religion) and gay males (sexual orientation). Blacks and Jews continue to be significantly targeted in multi-bias occurrences."

Community groups said they were encouraged by the decline in hate crime occurrences. In a joint statement, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and the African Canadian Legal Clinic applauded police efforts against hate crimes, though Congress Ontario chair Joel Richler added, "It is profoundly disturbing that our communities continue to be the target of unacceptable acts of hatred."

B'nai Brith Canada noted the drop in reported cases, but said the organization remained concerned about unreported incidents "and the overall continuing climate of prejudice and hate."

Exhibit features objects from European immigrants

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

An exhibit featuring artifacts belonging to members of Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue who immigrated to Canada opened recently at the shul.

"New Beginnings: From the Old Worlds to the New – 'I packed my suitcase and in it I put…'" will showcase the objects that people brought with them from Europe after the war, as well as items that congregants from other parts of the world have decided to show to the community.

In the six display cases are a gas mask and warden's helmet from World War II in London, siddurs, an original ketubah from India, a top hat brought from Berlin in the 1930s, a Moroccan coffee grinder and an official jacket of the Pakistani Cricket Club, as well as passports, original school certificates, and many more memorabilia that people have dug up.

The idea for this display came about when Rabbi William Rosenthal, a shul member, approached the synagogue because he had a collection of keepsakes that he wanted to share with others.

"I saw what he had to offer and felt this was something definitely worthwhile to put on show," said exhibit chair Marilyn Anthony. "We felt it would be a very nice idea to do an exhibit about various members from the synagogue, who had moved from other countries to see what it was that they managed or chose to bring with them."

Rabbi Rosenthal was in a World War II work camp and kept a tiny siddur with him the entire time. The siddur is featured along with a small pair of tfillin he got in exchange for work after managing to escape.Parts of one piece of jewelry on display were exchanged during the war to pay for rent and food, as well as to buy fake passports to escape.

Write-ups about the items on display are included, so people can understand how some of these things came to be significant.

"The genesis of the exhibit is to try and see what was the common thread running through, what was important enough to everybody that they would try and save it," he said.

Artifacts in the exhibit, which runs until after Rosh Hashanah, will be rotated in June.

Warped tree, bitter fruit

As recently as Feb. 3, Khaled Mashaal, the leader of Hamas, the party that now forms the majority in the Palestinian Legislative Council, told a gathering in a mosque in Damascus: "Before Israel dies, it must be humiliated and degraded."

Less than two weeks later, on Feb. 14, he reinforced the Damascus message at a rally in Khartoum, Sudan."There will be no recognition of Israel, and there will be no security for the occupation and colonization forces. Resistance will remain our strategic option."

Four days later, the members of Mashaal's party elected on Jan. 25 by their Palestinian peers, were sworn into office and immediately heard their prime minister-designate, Ismail Haniya, reject the call by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, for the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority to honour existing agreements with Israel.

Haniya made plain that his party will not veer from its founding principle and "moral" guideline, namely, that the Jewish people has no right to a sovereign home in the Middle East.

In response to Hamas' ascension to power, the government of Israel acted as all other governments on earth would in similar situations: it announced a series of gradual measures to fight the foe that has brazenly made its pre-eminent strategic priority the annihilation of the Jewish state.

The first measure is the refusal to have any contacts with Hamas officials, that is, the people striving to destroy the Jewish state. The second is the curtailing of the transfer of monthly tax and customs revenues to the PA, a sum of more than $50 million (US) a month. Other steps are planned and will be implemented according to the developments on the ground, although humanitarian aid to needy Palestinians will not be disrupted.

There has already been a great deal of grumbling by Palestinians and their supporters against Israel that the withholding of the tax transfers will cause hardship and that Israel's refusal to release to freedom those Hamas and other party candidates sitting in Israeli jails but elected to the PLC is anti-democratic. But the grumbling is hollow and the complaints vacuous.

Palestinian voters do not obligate Israel.

There is no system of law anywhere on earth that obliges Israel to release individuals – in most cases convicted murderers – who are lawfully imprisoned under Israeli law simply because they were elected to public office somewhere else.

Israel will not yield to the priorities of its enemies. Its highest moral imperative is to the safety and well-being of its own people. Indeed most honest, fair-minded observers understand that Hamas' rise to power in the PA poses a mortal danger to Jordan and Egypt as well as to Israel.

The West must remain steadfast alongside Israel in opposing Hamas' politicidal, if not also genocidal, aims.

It is the Palestinians who will eat the bitter fruit of their warped electoral tree, not the Israelis.

Danish king didn't wear a yellow star

In the penultimate sentence of your editorial ("We are all Danes!" CJN, Feb. 9), you refer to the popular legend of Danish King Christian X, who, during the German occupation, supposedly donned a yellow star in support of the Danish Jews. In fact, this never happened. No one in Denmark wore the yellow star because there never was an order from the Nazis to do so in Denmark.

Officially, until Rosh Hashanah 1943, Danish Jews had the same "rights" as any other Danish citizen. The Nazi proconsul in Denmark, Werner Best, had even warned Berlin to go easy on Danish Jews lest it give fuel to the growing Danish resistance movements. Yet, on that day, the action against Danish Jews was to begin. Their rescue became part of history, although even today, the rescue is regarded by most Danes as simply helping their neighbours and friends.

The legend of the king and the yellow star probably started in a Swedish newspaper cartoon, where the king is depicted as being asked what Danes were going to do if the government ordered Jews to wear the yellow star, to which the king replies, "Then we'll all have to wear yellow stars." Leon Uris propagated this myth in his novel Exodus. Since then, it has become one of the many legends of World War II, one at which Danes often chuckle, but one which, in truth, symbolizes the spirit of the Danish national character.

BBC reporting about Israel biased

Many organizations have chastised the BBC for its biased and unfair reporting about Israel. Here is another recent example, which surely justifies the refusal of most Israeli television channels to rebroadcast the programs from BBC.

On Wednesday, Feb. 15, one of the BBC's main stories was titled "Disabled Jenin man shot by troops." The same headline was at the top of the Middle East stories on the broadcaster's website, with the added information that the victim "was among a number of children" who have challenged the Israelis operating in the Jenin area. But when one reads the entire report, it becomes clear that the article is another blatant and cheap anti-Israel distortion, typical of the British broadcaster.

Here is what it really happened. A number of Israeli soldiers were attacked in Jenin by stone-throwing young Palestinians, including a man called Mujahid al-Simadi, who was over 20 years old, not a child, and was brandishing a gun. After al-Simadi was allegedly hit by an Israeli bullet, he apparently died in hospital. Soon thereafter, the story started circulating that he was only carrying a toy gun and that he had a "learning disability." No one, however, was able to certify the rumour, see the alleged toy gun or verify the disability claim, but BBC swallowed it without any concern for corroboration or accuracy, while adding its own little juice to the unverified allegation.

One wonders whether any British soldiers, confronting an armed attacker during a confrontation in an area where terrorist attacks are a daily occurrence, would have first verified if the weapon was a real one. A few years ago, in Vancouver, a young man in a house searched by the RCMP for drugs, took out a toy gun. He was shot point-blank and died instantly. There was a similar incident at an American school last month, with a student carrying a gun replica. In both cases, the police were found to have acted properly.

Finally, in the same broadcast, BBC reported that three demonstrators were killed by the Pakistani police while rioting in protest against the infamous Danish caricatures. Unfortunately, BBC did not investigate whether any of them had learning disabilities.

Building bridges with Muslims

I am not the only rabbi here involved in reaching out to the Islamic community ("Rabbi looks for way to build bridge with Muslims," CJN, Jan. 19). Rabbi Aubrey Glazer has been involved in an ongoing Judaic/Islamic Reading Circle meeting at the Wolfond Centre at the University of Toronto and at the Noor Centre. He also co-ordinated two Slichot-Sulha services before the High Holy Days. Rabbi John Moscowitz at Holy Blossom Temple has initiated a seminar with an Islamic scholar, and other rabbis are also involved in efforts at dialogue with the Islamic community.

It should also be said that my dialogue endeavours and others have been encouraged and fostered by the efforts of the Canadian Jewish Congress. This organization is to be commended for the grassroots work it does in helping to develop ongoing relationships between the Jewish community and other religious and ethnic communities. It is my hope that the work of the CJC will be recognized and appreciated by our community.

We settlers are not the enemy

By RABBI SHLOMO RISKIN
Jerusalem Post

Why was the demolition of the nine homes in Amona accompanied by so much violence on both sides of the ideological spectrum, whereas the destruction of the Gush Katif settlements in Gaza only seven months earlier took place amid comparative understanding and sensitivity – with crying and decrying, with dancing and denying, but largely devoid of the use of force?

Apparently, the overwhelming majority of those who feel part of the settler community, while strongly disagreeing with the "disengagement" policy – either because they are Zionistically and humanistically opposed to uprooting Jewish settlements, or because they are against giving a prize of encouragement to terror and Hamas in this critical time of Palestinian internal dissension and external aggression – might well endorse passive resistance, but would clearly stop short of violence.

So what happened half a year later in Amona? I'm not merely writing about the youth who demonstrated in Amona. I'm talking about murmurings throughout the settler community, which has been radicalized far beyond the red lines of Gush Katif.

The explanation lies between the lines of a survey conducted by Prof. Dalia Mor of the College of Management in Rishon Letzion that examined the attitudes of Israelis toward various sectors of our broader society: Ashkenazim, Sephardim, secularists, settlers, haredim, rightists, leftists, Israeli Arabs, new immigrants and foreign workers.

The survey revealed that the sector most hated by the Israeli population are the Palestinians, with the settlers a close second. And among those respondents who defined themselves as left-wingers, hostility toward the settlers ranked higher than hostility toward the Palestinians – 67 per cent versus 55 per cent.

This study helped to explain a most curious phenomenon. Israelis may have many faults – reckless driving, an inability to admit wrongdoing, a lack of subtlety – but a lack of generosity to people in trouble is not one of them. Our telephones and doorbells ring every 10 minutes with requests for aid to needy families and institutions. As well, Israel the fledgling state welcomed underprivileged and undereducated refugees from Third World countries in comparative numbers unrivalled by any other country, and our burgeoning nation was among the first to take in the Vietnamese boat people and to send volunteers and raise funds for people made homeless by the South Asian tsunami, the earthquake in Pakistan and Hurricane Katrina.

With this history, why is there no national outcry on behalf of expelled residents of Gush Katif, most of whom are still waiting to receive their government subsidies and are living in substandard housing, without any means of employment? These residents of Gush Katif did not build their settlements as thieves in the night. They were sent as the agents of every Israeli government since the Six Day War, and they turned a desert into a garden of fruits, vegetables and flowers that were exported to the world. Why is the government, as well as the majority of the population, so indifferent to their fate? It can only be because the entire settlement community has become a demonized and delegitimized sector of Israel society.

And this is what explains Amona: the government (and Supreme Court) would not accept a mere seven-day delay to enable the settlers themselves to dismantle their homes and restore whatever they could as they resumed their lives in Ofra, and the police came out on horseback, brandishing clubs and often striking indiscriminately, as the pictures seem to testify.

I certainly do not condone in any way the stone-throwing violence of many of the young people who were there. But the settler community came to Amona already feeling disenfranchised and abandoned, and unfortunately, those who feel pushed against the wall of hatred and indifference often act with violence, because they sense they have nothing to lose. And tragically, the overreaction of the police only exacerbated the settler perception that we are enemy Number 1, even before Hamas.

What is the source of our repugnant status? Some refer to us as leeches who have sucked the Israeli treasury dry and caused undeserved stagnation to the Negev and the Galil with our demands to fund our ill-advised settlements. Others even charge us with immorality, since we have robbed the Palestinians of lands that rightfully belong to them. There are voices, such as former Knesset speaker Avraham Burg, who have internalized the cruel canard our enemies have cynically flung at us, holding us responsible for the "freedom fighting" suicide bombers who murder the innocent citizens of Netanya, Tel Aviv, Hadera and Petach Tikva.

These voices have forgotten the Treaty of Versailles and the Balfour Declaration, which initially called for 18 Arab states and one Jewish state on both sides of the Jordan. They portray us as white European Boers conquering and colonizing the "South African" homelands of the native Palestinians, paying no mind that it is us Jews who have lived in this area for 4,000 years in unbroken continuity and that we comprised the majority of those who lived on and worked these lands in the 19th and early 20th centuries.

In their blind idealization of the possibilities for peace with the Palestinians, they choose to overlook the facts that from the United Nations Partition Plan on Nov. 29, 1947, to the tense period preceding the Six Day War, to the Oslo Agreements, to the Camp David Summit meeting between former U.S. president Bill Clinton, former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak and Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat, it is we the Israelis who have consistently been willing to compromise and it has been the Arabs who have refused offer after offer to share this land. Yes, you can only make peace with your enemy, but that enemy must be willing to make peace with you.

Security forces square off at Amona with demonstrators opposed to the dismantling of the illegal outpost. [Israel photo]

Nevertheless, the majority of Israelis seems to have "bought into" the "immorality" of our position and thereby condone any ill-treatment we may receive as being well deserved.

We are proud of our settlements, proud of the unique and close relationship that some of us have succeeded in establishing with our Palestinian neighbours, proud of our educational network, proud of the idealism and patriotism of our youth, who still find their way into the most elite and dangerous units of the Israel Defence Forces.

But we are hurt and dismayed by the hatred that is being levelled against us. Yes, the settler community speaks with different voices, and from varying degrees of a wide right-wing perspective, but the overwhelming majority of us are rational, committed, patriotic and idealistic citizens. Do we not deserve to be embraced and co-opted in a consensus government (even if that government rejects Greater Israel as a viable option) rather than to be cast aside and delegitimized as criminals?

Most of us would welcome a plan that would enable us to live in peace with peaceful neighbours, but instead we are being told that many of our legal settlements (beyond the "fence") will have to be dismantled even as Hamastan is gaining unprecedented (since Hitler) political support and renewed terrorism is rearing its ugly head.

The government's policy that unilateral separation will enhance our ability to defend ourselves has yet to be proven, and the government's promise that once we retreat from settlements it will be easier to extirpate the enemy has yet to begin to be implemented, but the destruction of our homes and uprooting of our settlers is taking place with great dispatch and within an atmosphere of zeal and political victory that only strengthens our feelings that we, the settlers, have become the major enemy of Israel.

Does the government not realize that the insensitivity and hatred we feel emanating from its policies only serves to energize the extremist elements of our population – and threatens to rob our state of the most committed and idealistic of our youth (God forbid)?

And now for my deepest fear. If the Israeli population hates us, the settlers, then they must also hate themselves. After all, modern Israel was founded by settlers who settled on the swamp areas of Tel Aviv, Petach Tikva, Huleh Valley and Kinneret that were claimed by the Palestinians. Indeed, the Palestinian press refers not only to Efrat as a settlement, but to Haifa, west Jerusalem, Netanya and Tel Aviv as illegal settlements. If our government continues to delegitimize the settler community and deliver us a knock-out punch, I fear that we will eventually be evacuating Tekoa, Efrat and then Jerusalem – but from the PA-Hamas perspective, it will be Tel Aviv first.

Rabbi Riskin is the founder and chancellor of Ohr Torah Stone Colleges and chief rabbi of Efrat.

Apartheid analogy rehashed

Though facts on the ground may change, and Israel's disengagement from Gaza is but one example, it seems nonetheless that the worn canards of the Palestinian narrative always remain the same. No matter how erudite the discussion, there is usually no escape from the inevitable references to "Israel's illegal occupation" or "Israel's land grab" or "Israel is an apartheid state."

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

The most recent rehash of the apartheid analogy comes not from the propaganda machines of a Middle East dictatorship, but from the Guardian, a widely read British daily. In a lengthy two-part report that appeared Feb. 6 and 7, correspondent Chris McGreal presents his arguments with seeming coherence and enthusiasm. Having spent more than a decade in Johannesburg and four years in Jerusalem, he brings to his writing an air of authority borne of extensive personal experience and a well-cultivated network of political contacts in both South Africa and Israel.

What is troubling about the Guardian articles, as with others like them, is that they tend to begin with a premise that is inherently flawed. A web of tendentious comparisons, usually embellished by carefully selected, though invariably biased commentators, provide the next dimension to the emerging opinion. It's then left to the writer to conclude with his or her own interpretation of the essay's key points.

McGreal tends to avoid this third construct. As he nears the end of his discourse, he still leaves it to the pundits to make his case. Many of the reported comments are taken out of context – coming primarily from Israelis who dwell on the fringes of the political spectrum, left and right, and from Jewish South Africans who are recognizable not only for their activism in the anti-apartheid struggle but also for their previously expressed hostility toward Israel. The end result translates into yet another scathing attack on Israeli policies and practices, with special reference to the era following the Six Day War in 1967.

There are, of course, detailed analyses that have effectively debunked the arguments that promote common cause between the State of Israel and pre-1994 apartheid South Africa. Any rational examination of apartheid will, in fact, entrench it as a uniquely South African phenomenon that ranks as one of the foremost anomalies of the 20th century. It ran its course, but, as with tyrannies that have both preceded and followed it, we have seen its demise – and rightly so.

Accusing Israel of "apartheid practices" smacks of intellectual dishonesty and moral bankruptcy. It should be seen exactly for what it is: a fallacy and an outrage used by Israel-bashers the world over to discredit and marginalize the Jewish state and those who support its viability within secure and defensible borders.

Shaking the foundations of our wishful thinking

Just about everyone was wrong. Only a few short weeks ago, pundits were assuring us of a victory in Palestinian legislative elections by Fatah, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' political party, and a significant showing by Hamas, with as much as 40 per cent of the popular Palestinian vote.

Russ Culiner in Jerusalem

From the highest echelons of the Israeli intelligence establishment (I heard it with my own ears) to the most expert analysts in academia (I heard it with my own ears) to the respected Palestinian pollster Khalil Shikaki (I heard it with my own ears), they grossly miscalculated.

The blame for the "intelligence failure" should be laid, I believe, squarely at the doorstep of the artificial intellectual construct we've used to shore up the shaky foundations of our wishful thinking. Since 9/11, we have tended to paint our world in black and white: Islamic fundamentalism is bad, while any alternative, Fatah included, is more desirable. This knee-jerk bias completely blinded us to the hard truth about our chosen "good guys," just as it did about our chosen Hamas "bad guys." Meanwhile, we got a few things quite wrong.

One popular, yet erroneous presupposition, for example, is that the Palestinians are largely a secular people for whom an appeal to purely Islamic sentiments is of secondary importance or concern. But secularism, as many westerners may understand it, is largely alien to the mentality of this region.

High-blown religious rhetoric infiltrates every aspect of Middle Eastern societies and psyches, Israel not excepted. Just as the notion of a Jewish state would make little sense unnourished by a deep religious awareness and history, so, too, the prideful proclamations of Hamas appeal to a deep-seated nostalgia for a glorious Islamic past among the essentially pious and long-suffering Palestinian people. And let's not forget that even the late PA president Yasser Arafat, of Fatah, purposely titled the Palestinian "national" uprising the "Al-Aqsa Intifadah", shrewdly conferring on the struggle an aura of a religious war, or even a crusade.

Another of our self-delusions was that we had a partner for peace in the person of Mahmoud Abbas. This, too, was a baseless conclusion. His whimpering reluctance to tackle homegrown terror long ago nipped in the bud any hope of meaningful dialogue. And whatever contacts there have been up to now have proved sterile and unproductive. He had shown himself to be a weak, irresolute, sort-of-likeable nebbish. Decisive leadership, vision and action were completely wanting.

And what about the danger that the sources of much-needed external funding would dry up? Well, it should not be forgotten that the Palestinian Authority has distinguished itself by rampant corruption at all levels. Hundreds of millions of dollars were squandered or vanished without a trace into the pockets of the few. The infrastructure in the Palestinian territories is a total shambles, the poor as poor and disgruntled as ever. Despair is pervasive. Everybody was thirsty for change.

And as for terror, how many have noted that the attacks of the past few months were only rarely instigated by Hamas? For the most part, they were the work of various rogue factions, but not infrequently also of the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, the military wing of our deposed "partners for peace," the ruling Fatah organization!

On the surface of it, voting a radically Islamic terrorist organization into power would appear to be totally against Palestinians' self-interest. International condemnation of Hamas' ideology and activities, as well as its hatred of Jews and the West, might very well squelch any hope of progress on the diplomatic front. And no doubt many people are once again hemming, hawing and sighing wearily to themselves that this is merely one further illustration of Arabs, as Abba Eban quipped, doing their best not to miss an opportunity to miss an opportunity.

But it was Hamas, and not the PA, that for years has provided needy Palestinians with what they rightly expect and deserve from their leaders – clean administration untainted by corruption, a huge investment in education, social services and medical clinics, and a clear vision for the future.

Hamas has done some good by its people, whereas Fatah has not. And the voters told them both so in no uncertain terms, whatever we might think.

Canada should rethink its Jerusalem policies

Following the election victory of Hamas, it's a strange time for a group of Canadians to be proposing a "permanent solution" to the issue of Jerusalem.

But the team headed by Michael Bell, a former Canadian ambassador to Egypt and Israel and a high-level official in Canada's Department of Foreign Affairs, has decided to overlook these complexities. In the next few weeks, the groups plans to unveil a project that claims to "provide peace negotiators with ideas on how to settle [the issue of] Jerusalem within the context of a peace agreement." Bell even declares the grand goal of "changing the way people think about the old city of Jerusalem" and to present ideas that never been discussed before. This is a tall order for the Holy City, a religious centre that has been fought over for more than 3,000 years, since it was conquered and made the capital of David's kingdom.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Beyond the natural skepticism that anyone (particularly a foreign diplomat) can provide a "solution" based on "new ideas," Bell's project suffers from what academics call methodological failure. We are told that these proposals are gleaned from interviews with 300 people "mostly in the Middle East" – a very small fraction of whom have detailed knowledge and familiarity with Jerusalem's history, meaning, and reality. And how many of these 300 were carefully chosen to justify the predetermined conclusions of Bell's team?

As a result, the publication of this report and a major press campaign may garner some short-term attention in the media, but Israelis and Palestinians – Jews, Muslims, and Christians – who make up Jerusalem's population are busy coping with reality on the ground. Jews, in particular, have not forgotten the history of failed grand peace plans and schemes for redesigning Jerusalem.

The reality is that the "peace process" to which Bell and other Canadian diplomats cling is dormant and will remain so for many years. The late Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat's rejectionism, including his attempts to erase Jewish history in Jerusalem and his use of terrorism, destroyed the hopes of the Oslo process. Now, the dominance of Hamas has cemented this situation.

This is clearly not the time to promote yet another counterproductive scheme for dividing Jerusalem, particularly when it will be seen by Palestinians as support for media campaigns to portray the Israeli presence as illegitimate. Canada's new government under Prime Minister Stephen Harper would do well to stay away from this report. And Canadian groups such as the Canada-Israel Committee are helping by refocusing attention on the centrality of Jerusalem to Israeli and Jewish identity.

At the same time, there are important steps that Canada can take on Jerusalem short of naive claims of a "grand solution." The government can and should start a review of Canada's failed diplomacy over the past two decades, particularly in adopting a predominantly Arab position on the city.

In this realm, the time has come to end the foolish policy of omitting the word "Israel" from Canadian passports issued to Jews born in Jerusalem. Defenders of this policy in the Department of Foreign Affairs use the false claim that Jerusalem is illegally "occupied territory." Indeed, the Jewish Quarter and the Temple Mount were occupied in the 1948 Arab attack and 3,000 years of Jewish history was largely destroyed. In this period before the 1967 war, the armistice agreement that promised access to holy sites was ignored when it came to Jews, who were not allowed to pray at the Western Wall or elsewhere. The Canadian government's policy of refusing to allow Israeli escorts on official visits to the Jewish Quarter and the Wall is a sad remnant of this period, and it's both historically and morally wrong.

Most of the world now recognizes that when peace negotiations eventually resume, the future of Jerusalem, including borders, will be determined by the parties, and not by foreigners. The 1949 armistice lines (often erroneously referred to as borders) will finally be discarded, and the Jewish Quarter of Jerusalem, as well as other areas, will be accepted as part of Israel's capital and historic legacy. Canada can help this process by recognizing these realities, rather than continuing to promote outdated fictions.

Most Muslims in France want integration

The nationwide civil unrest that convulsed France last autumn raised painful questions about the integration of Muslims in French society. But interestingly enough, the riots hardly touched Marseille, which has one of the largest concentrations of Arabs in this country.

Sheldon Kirshner in Marseille

Salah Bariki, a 54-year-old municipal official of Algerian descent who has lived in this attractive Mediterranean port since 1963, is not surprised that Marseille – a city of 800,000 inhabitants that is still living down a reputation as a seedy redoubt of criminal gangs and drug lords – was more or less spared by the violence. Marseille, an entry point for immigrants from as close as Morocco and as far away as China, is outwardly a lot like Toronto or Montreal in terms of its "live-and-let-live" atmosphere.

A multicultural melting pot, the city is home to 200,000 Muslims,120,000 of whom hail from North Africa and a handful of whom are Palestinians. Nearly all of its 80,000 Jews are from three countries – Algeria, Morocco and Tunisia – while its 80,000 Armenians are mainly the offspring of refugees who fled persecution in the Ottoman Empire during World War I. Marseille's 300,000 Italians are the descendants of immigrants who landed here in the early 20th century.

Marseille also has a sizeable sub-community of pieds noirs, the French settlers who left Algeria when it gained independence from France in 1962. Much like the Jews forced out of the Gaza Strip last summer, the pieds noirs tend to be politically right wing, and still wax nostalgic about the so-called good old days in Algeria. In the last French presidential election in 2002, Jean Marie Le Pen's far-right, xenophobic party, the National Front, won 25 per cent of the vote in Marseille, and one can safely assume that a fair proportion of his supporters were pieds noirs and their children.

Muslims have been a fixture in Marseille since the French colonization of Algeria in the 1830s, and their descendants have been successfully integrated. According to Bariki, integration is the goal of the majority of Muslims today. Bariki's view is shared by Brandeis University political scientist Jyette Klausen, the author of The Islamic Challenge: Politics and Religion in Western Europe. But, as Bariki conceded, a small minority of Muslims have vigorously resisted integration, as did most of the Arab oldtimers who came here decades ago with the intention of making money and going straight back home.

As elsewhere in western Europe in the 20th century, most Muslims reached France through guest-worker and family reunification programs. There are presently 15 to 20 million Muslims in Europe, and that figure is expected to double by 2025. France has five to seven million Muslim inhabitants, representing about 10 per cent of its overall population, more than any other country on the continent. The Jewish population is estimated to be 600,000 to 700,000.

In an interview in his spare office in a semi-industrial part of Paris, Fouad Alaoui, the secretary-general of the Union of French Islamic Organizations, told me that projections call for France to have 10 to 12 million Muslims by 2050. The Muslim birthrate is slightly higher than the national average, but lower than in Arab countries.

Alaoui – a 44-year-old doctor from Fez, Morocco, who settled in France a quarter of a century ago to finish his education – said that French Arabs are victimized by racial prejudice and dogged by Islamophobia. "It would be harder for a Mohammed to find a job than an Andre," he said. "We have more difficulties than Jews in terms of discrimination. Jews have been in France much longer and are better accepted."

Bariki, who considers himself thoroughly assimilated and claims he has never personally encountered prejudice, agrees that Muslims face more than the usual hurdles when applying for jobs and seeking housing. Alaoui said that North African Arabs, in particular, have been made to feel like rank outsiders. Citing an example, he said that municipalities often resist Muslim requests to add minarets to their mosques. Few of the 1,500 mosques in France have minarets. "It will take time," he mused in a reference to the possible resolution of that smouldering grievance.

Due to these and other factors, Islamic fundamentalism has taken root in France and in the rest of Europe, producing a generation of disaffected, alienated Muslims. In one alarming case, a 38-year-old Belgian convert to Islam, Muriel Degauque, was recruited as a suicide bomber. Last November, in Iraq, she detonated her explosive vest in Baquba, killing herself and wounding an American soldier.

Bariki contends that militant Muslims not only endanger themselves, but they jeopardize the status of French Muslims by directly challenging France's historic commitment to secularism. "If you disagree with them, they claim you are not a Muslim," said Bariki, an avowed secularist.

French authorities have been concerned by the spectre of radical Islam since at least 1995, when the Paris subway system was bombed by Muslim extremists with a loss of several lives. Rachid Ramda, an Algerian extradited from Britain, was charged with terrorism and is soon expected to stand trial. Last March, a court sentenced six French Algerians to lengthy prison terms for their roles in a 2001 plot to bomb the U.S. embassy in Paris.

France has adopted a carrot-and-stick approach toward Islamic radicalism.

The government has dismantled networks suspected of preparing terror attacks, expelled dozens of Muslim clerics who have engaged in inflammatory rhetoric, placed certain mosques under police surveillance and banned all overt religious symbols, including the hijab – the girls' Islamic headscarf – in public schools.

Rabbi Charles Bismuth

Salah Bariki

Fouad Alaoui

By the same token, France has launched a concerted program to train moderate imams and encourage the formation of a tolerant form of French Islam. Nicolas Sarkozy, the minister of interior, is considering amending a 1905 law so that the state can fund the construction of new mosques and thus bring the Muslim community into the mainstream.

These initiatives are implicitly aimed at defusing the growth of anti-Semitism among Muslim youths. Jewish community officials hold them largely responsible for the dramatic escalation of attacks against Jews and Jewish institutions since the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising in September 2000.

When I asked Alaoui to comment on these outbreaks, he turned defensive. "I have had discussions with CRIF – the Conseil Représentatif des Institutions Juives de France – on this problem," he said. "I told them that Islam can't be anti-Semitic. Islam gives privileged status to Jews and Christians."

When I pressed him, he relented. "There is anti-Semitism, yes, but it's a question of juvenile delinquency. I don't deny that a stupid boy may attack a Jew. But CRIF has blown these anti-Semitic actions out of proportion."

Convinced that Islam does not propagate anti-Semitism, Alaoui declared that young Muslims have been inflamed by the Arab-Israeli conflict. He heatedly denied an accusation, levelled by the Simon Wiesenthal Center, that his organization has funnelled money to Hamas. "These accusations are lies. We have no relations with Hamas."

Back in Marseille, I discussed the problem with the city's chief rabbi, Charles Bismuth, who immigrated to France from Tunisia in 1961 and sits on the board of Marseille Espérance, a municipally funded organization that has promoted brotherhood since its creation in 1990 and publishes an annual ecumenical calendar.

"We have a good relationship with 98 per cent of the Muslims in Marseille," he said, accentuating the positive. "The objective of Jews and Muslims is to live together peacefully."

Rabbi Bismuth claimed that neo-Nazis rather than Muslim radicals were probably behind the destruction by arson of a local synagogue in March 2002, when Israel launched Operation Defensive Shield in the West Bank.

To Rabbi Bismuth, anti-Semitism was an "aggravating" rather than a "determining" factor in the decision of 300 local Jews to emigrate in 2004. Almost all of them went to Israel, first to be reunited with family members and, second, to upgrade their economic prospects.

RBC's Gordon Nixon to receive UJA/CIJA Words & Deeds Leadership Award

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Human potential is being wasted in Canada when immigrants can't find good jobs to match their skills.

That's the assessment of RBC Financial Group president and CEO, Gordon Nixon who, on March 29, will become the first recipient of the Words & Deeds Leadership Award, which will be presented jointly by UJA Federation and the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA).

The award, to be conferred at the Words & Deeds Leadership Dinner at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre, recognizes community leaders who make important contributions to humanitarian causes, to tolerance, inclusion and the fight against racism in Canadian society.

In an interview with Jewish Toronto, Nixon said that immigrants represent an "untapped potential" that Canada must work aggressively to release.

"Over the past decade, immigrants have arrived in Canada better educated and at similar stages in their careers as those born in Canada, but they have not found jobs that match their skill levels and they are learning less than those born in Canada," says Nixon. "This is a waste of human potential and represents a direct hit to our economy."

Ensuring successful immigrant integration into our society, he added, "is not just about social justice, it's about seizing an opportunity."

Nixon also believes that few cities stand to gain as much economic benefit as Toronto, because of its diversity. "In Canada, if we want vibrant, prosperous communities and an excellent standard of living, then we need to become one of the world's most competitive nations to foot the bill," he says. "You can't have a well-intentioned social agenda without a sound economic agenda and we must ensure that we have social policies if we are going to meet our challenges. This is where an issue of diversity comes in. I truly believe that one of the ways to grow Canada's economy is to better leverage diversity in our workplace and communities, and which is why I've adopted this as one of my key priorities."

The recipient of a number of community service awards in the past and an active supporter of community causes, Nixon believes that his community involvement – and that of other business leaders – is an important opportunity, one not to be wasted.

"Absolutely," he says, "CEO's are often placed in a privileged position when it comes to influencing thinking on civic issues and in areas like philanthropy. I believe corporations and their leaders have a responsibility to their communities and society-at-large. For business leaders to squander the opportunity to make a difference is a wasted opportunity and a disservice to one's organization."

With many of Canada's financial services institutions at the top of not-for-profit call lists when it comes time to ask for financial help, the ability to prioritize is an essential skill possessed by Nixon.

"As much as possible, I do try to get involved with campaigns and causes that matter to me personally and to RBC as well," he says. "But I also think that one of the most important roles a leader must play is to encourage others to get involved."

In the February 2 Jewish Toronto tribute page to Andrea Bronfman z"l, it was erroneously reported that of the 13,000 Canadians who have participated in birthright israel trips over the years, 2,000 were from Toronto. In fact, since the inception of the birthright israel initiative, over 7,000 Torontonians have participated.

Award dinner honours RBC's Gordon Nixon

Event promotes UJA Federation / CIJA partnership

By CARLA LANCIT
UJA Federation

On March 29, Gordon Nixon, President and Chief Executive Officer, RBC Financial Group, will become the first recipient of the Words & Deeds Leadership Award.

The award, which will be bestowed on Nixon jointly by the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, recognizes leaders who make outstanding contributions to humanitarian causes and to tolerance, inclusion, and civil discourse in Canadian society.

CIJA is funded by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and other Canadian Federations through UIA Federations Canada.

"Recipients of the award will be those who demonstrate - by their words and deeds — that the efforts of one can lead to the benefit of many," says CIJA CEO Hershell Ezrin. "This award honours Gord Nixon for his contribution to a more inclusive Canadian society."

More than 1,000 guests will be at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre to attend the Awards Dinner headed by honorary chairs Gerald Schwartz and Lawrence Tanenbaum, working with co-chairs Brent Belzberg, Richard Venn and Charles Winograd, and an extensive tribute committee.

According to Ezrin, that close partnership plays an important role in CIJA's ongoing efforts to translate ambitious national objectives like Israel advocacy and fighting anti-Semitism, into local activities.

"We act as an agency for advocacy of UIA, in close contact with the Federation," says Ezrin.

The collaboration is mutually beneficial, notes David Engel, chair of the Board of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "In Toronto, we've developed an Ontario-based advocacy committee along with CIJA," he says. The committee, which includes representatives from UJA Federation, CIJA, and the different advocacy agencies, meets regularly, coordinates programs, and ensures that people are working together on issues like school funding, campus concerns, Israel-related initiatives, health care, and homecare for the elderly. Engel notes that there is communication between both lay leaders and professionals on a day-to-day basis. "There's an integral give and take in terms of what the issues are, and how we're addressing them," he says.

David Engel

Hershell Ezrin

That kind of communication is imperative because different expertise rests in different agencies, adds Morris Perlis, who serves on the boards of both UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and CIJA. "If you don't bring people together you just do your own thing without knowledge that one of your sister organizations may have done it before, or might know somebody."

Democracy in Action, an initiative of CIJA, brought UJA Federation participants to Ottawa in November, 2004 to meet with members of Parliament. Here, participants meet with Stephen Harper, then leader of the opposition, and today, the Prime Minister of Canada.

CIJA also works with UJA Federation - as well as its constituent organizations - the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) - to send missions to Israel involving Canadians of influence. "We've taken politicians and business leaders to Israel," says Ezrin. "What they tell other people is incredible."

According to Ezrin, touring Israel with non-Jews and first-time visitors allows veteran UJA mission participants to see Israel through fresh eyes. At the same time, non-Jewish participants get a first-hand look at the commitment of the Jewish community to Israel and to community service.

As a board member of both organizations, Perlis is in a unique position to comment on the partnership. "We have a better operating relationship than has existed for many years," he says. "Before CIJA was created, there was a separation of the lines of responsibility and communication between the Federations across the country and the local Congresses. Even if they were often physically close by, there wasn't the demand for the day-to-day interaction or the process to ensure commonality of focus."

Belzberg and Cummings dedicated to the cause

"If you look at the world around you, you have to be active to make a difference," says Brent Belzberg.

Through their work with CIJA, Belzberg and his co-chair Steven Cummings have proven the point. "They are absolutely diligent and so involved in many different ways," says CEO Hershell Ezrin.

As an example of their dedication, Ezrin points to the weekly conference calls held by the organization's leadership. "They can be anywhere in the world, but they're on that call every week."

Steven Cummings

Belzberg, a past UJA Federation campaign chair, is the Managing Partner of Torquest Partners Inc. He has long been active in community affairs. In addition to serving as co-chair of CIJA, Belzberg currently serves as a director of Mount Sinai Hospital, Baycrest Hospital Foundation, and as an advisor to several faculties at the University of Toronto

Cummings is President and Chief Executive Officer of Maxwell Cummings & Sons Holdings Limited. Active in community affairs, he is a past president of Montreal's Federation CJA and served both as president of the Jewish General Hospital Centre Board and its Foundation Board. Cummings currently serves on the Board of The Canadian Jewish News and is founding chair of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre and founding co-chair of PROMONTREAL. He was recently named to the Order of Canada for his voluntary service

Brent Belzberg

Belzberg and Cummings have both been involved in CIJA since the organization's creation. "It's because of them that this thing got off the ground at all," says Ezrin.

Ezrin says that CIJA has been blessed with dedicated lay leaders. "The commitment of the other volunteers is just as strong as the co-chairs," he says.

"There's a tremendous amount of satisfaction," says Cummings. "People who have not been involved don't understand how much joy you get out of it. It's a noble way to express your responsibilities as a member of a community, as a member of the human race, for that matter."

CIJA streamlines the advocacy process

Political influence, communal cohesion, high-level partnerships. For a relatively young organization, CIJA has some impressive accomplishments under its belt.

The Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), which is funded by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and other Canadian Federations through UIA Federations Canada, was created in January 2004 as an umbrella organization coordinating the work of groups such as the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), the Quebec-Israel Committee (QIC), Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), and National Jewish Campus Life.

"We were set up to address a need," says CEO Hershell Ezrin. "In the midst of the second intifada, Israel was getting hammered in the press, our government wasn't as responsive as we thought they should be, and there was an increase in anti-Semitism." Ezrin notes that while the advocacy organizations were doing a good job, they needed help to coordinate their efforts.

According to co-chair Steven Cummings, one of CIJA's greatest successes has been in creating a seamless relationship between the advocacy agencies. Centralized accounting and information-technology systems have allowed the agencies to cut administrative costs, and staff has been moved closer together so they can benefit from each other's knowledge and experience.

Ezrin says that the result is an atmosphere in which the advocacy organizations can achieve greater success. One noteable example is the change in Canada's voting record at the United Nations. Canada has changed its vote on six anti-Israel resolutions over the last two years.

"It's just a first step," says Ezrin, "but it's a huge change." "CIJA has been able to get politicians on the record." Prior to the January 23 federal election, CIJA interviewed all four party leaders.

"We also have had influence in creating awareness that there's a problem with complacency," says co-chair Brent Belzberg. "People have been writing op-ed pieces, writing to their MPs, getting involved in the political process."

Other achievements include funding for shlichim (emissaries from Israel) in 10 major campus cities, and academic exchanges between Canadian and Israeli universities.

Perhaps the biggest accomplishment, according to both Cummings and Belzberg, is the increased awareness in the general community of shared values between Canadians and Israelis. "Canadians have to better understand that the values of democracy, liberty, free press are as dear to Israelis as they are to Canadians," says Cummings.

Edwardian society comes to life

Arthur & George* by Julian Barnes, Random House Canada.

Books
Bernard Baskin

The crimes were mysterious and grisly. Some sadistic or insane individual, or gang of miscreants, were slitting the bellies of horses, cows and sheep. It seemed senseless and cruel, and the residents of a rural English village clamoured for the arrest of the vicious perpetrators. In addition, obscene and scurrilous letters were being sent to the village vicar and misleading ads in his name being published in the local paper.

The year was 1902 and the bumbling police force arrested George Edalji, a 27-year-old timid and myopic solicitor, the son of the local Parsee vicar.

George had been the longtime butt of racism, abuse and intimidation. Falsely arrested for the assorted wrongdoing, he is convicted and sentenced to seven years of penal servitude.

Here is where Arthur Conan Doyle, the renowned creator of Sherlock Holmes, enters this true story. The redoubtable Doyle, convinced of Edalji's innocence, aided by the widespread public outcry, managed to secure his release. In this manner, the lives of two disparate individuals were irreversibly bound together.

In some quarters, Doyle was hailed as the British Emile Zola, the French advocate of justice, who had defended the pilloried Jew, Alfred Dreyfus, and eventually helped to set him free.

Although the blameless Edalji was granted a pardon, he received no apology or compensation for his false arrest and imprisonment. Doyle was indignant. He fulminated: "This country, this England of ours has discovered a new legal concept. In the old days, you were either innocent or guilty. If you were not innocent, you were guilty, and if you were not guilty, you were innocent. A simple enough system, tried and tested down many centuries, grasped by judges, juries and the populace at large. As from today, we have a new concept in English law – guilty and innocent. George Edalji is a pioneer in this regard. The only man to be granted a free pardon for a crime he never committed and yet to be told at the same time that it was quite right he served three years' penal servitude."

Over the years, Doyle was a staunch believer in spiritualism and tried to commune with the spirits of the dead, much to the distaste of his more practical mother. "She is instinctively opposed to the psychic world, which for her represents anarchy and mumbo-jumbo… And then there is the family to consider. Arthur is a knight of the realm; he has lunched and dined with the king; he is a public figure – she repeats back to him his boast that he is second only to Kipling in his influence on the healthy, sporting young men of the country. What if it came out that he was involved in séances and suchlike? I would dish all chance of a peerage."

Barnes, a stylish literary craftsman, author of many books, including the widely praised Flaubert's Parrot, delves into Edwardian society to bring to life its prim conventions, staid courtroom procedures and oafish police. Especially noteworthy is the author's facility with dialogue.

This novel is engagingly intelligent, an entertaining recreation of a long-forgotten episode related with irony and precision by a master storyteller.

Danish Jews shrug off possible Shoah cartoons, rabbi says

By LAURYN KRONICK
Special to The CJN

ARHUS, Denmark — With the announcement that Iran's largest newspaper, Hamshahri, was holding a contest for cartoons that satirize the Holocaust, Danish Jews are waiting to see what the reaction will be from Danes and Muslims0.

"[The Iranians] are just looking for a fight and to get a reaction from us," said Rabbi Yitzi Loewenthal, director of Chabad in Denmark and one of Copenhagen's two rabbis.

"Most Jews will just shrug their shoulders and ignore the comics. Maybe they will even laugh."

After cartoons of the Muslim prophet Muhammad, published in September by the Danish daily newspaper Jyllands-Posten, became widely circulated in the Muslim world, Denmark's Jews have been breathing sighs of relief that they haven't been targeted in ensuing protests.

Along with other Danes, Jews have tried to go about their daily business, ignoring acts of violent protest in Muslim and non-Muslim countries across the world.

Rabbi Loewenthal said that Jews' successful assimilation into Danish society is the main reason they haven't been targeted in a similar way by Denmark's media outlets.

"The Danish Jewish community was successful in assimilating and integratng into [Danish] society," Rabbi Loewenthal said. "We are known and considered as Danes."

Mette Bentow, the youth and activity co-ordinator for the Jewish community, agreed that Denmark's Jews are not targets.

> Community successful in assimilating into society

"As Danish Jews, we do not have anything to worry about here," she said.

"But in the Arab world, we are a little nervous about our profile. The whole Islamic debate is ridiculous, and for [Iran] to pull in Israel and the Holocaust, they're just trying to stir up more trouble."

Earlier this month, after reports that Jyllands-Posten would publish the Holocaust cartoons from Iran, the paper's editor-in-chief assured readers that it would not.

In a statement on the paper's website, Carsten Juste said he would never publish any anti-Jewish or anti-Christian cartoons, adding that Jyllands-Posten's culture editor, Flemming Rose, had been pressured into telling an Iranian interviewer that he would consider publishing the Holocaust cartoons.

Bentow said she was confident Jyllands-Posten would never publish cartoons of an anti-Semitic nature, noting that Juste cleared up the "misunderstanding" shortly after it surfaced.

Ulf Haxen, chairman of the Society for Danish Jewish History and editor of the country's Jewish cultural magazine Rambam, believes the Iranian Holocaust cartoons won't affect Denmark's Jewish population.

He said that Jews have dealt with more difficult issues and that the cartoons are just a weak retaliation tactic on the part of Muslims.

"What's the problem? We've had [children's] cartoons like Tintin, where a strip features the prophet Muhammad," said Haxen. "The [Muhammad] cartoons are innocent, and should not result in such hysterical reactions. They can't be taken seriously."

Jewish Life

Maimonides offers lessons for us moderns

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

You all know his name. His books were banned as heretical, his perceived challenges to traditional Jewish ideas raked over the coals. Much discussion of his views – and much of it ill-informed – has taken place and continues to smoulder about the precise problem with his work.

Though his writing was meant to combat difficult issues in the relationship between faith and reason, and thus he came to praise Torah and not to bury her, this central fact was erased in the wake of vicious attack and counterattack, public pronouncements and private condemnations. He questioned whether some of the scientific statements of the Sages actually accorded with the best of contemporary thinking. His name has become synonymous with controversy. I refer, of course to Rabbi Moshe ben Maimon – Maimonides.

Supremely self-confident, the Rambam was never lax in sharply criticizing what he saw as erroneous thinking or pompous self-importance among supposed Jewish leaders. The Gaon of Baghdad in the 12th century was Shmuel ben Ali, who saw fit to malign Maimonides' great work of codification, the Mishneh Torah. In explaining to one of his students why he was attacked, Maimonides' "apology" for Shmuel ben Ali is deeply ironic: "Why, my son, should you take offence that a man whom people accustom from his youth to believe that there is none like him in his generation; when age, high office, aristocratic descent, the lack of people of discernment in this town, and his relationship with individuals, all have combined to produce this execrable consequence that each and every individual hangs expectantly on each word pronounced from the academy… why do you wonder that he has acquired such [evil] traits? How, my son, could you imagine that he should love truth enough to acknowledge his weakness?… This is a thing that a man like him will never do, as it was not done by better men who preceded him" (from a letter to Joseph ben Judah in Iggerot ha-Rambam, ed. D.H. Baneth, 1946).

Although Maimonides clearly and emphatically advocated the mastery of the classical Jewish curriculum, including Tanach, Talmud and Halachah, his vision of Jewish education went much further. As Haim ben-Sasson has noted, Maimonides ultimately viewed typical Talmudic study, when seen as an end in and of itself, as "being of questionable value." When he discusses Shmuel ben-Ali's son-in-law, Zecharia, Rambam's tone turns caustic: "He is a very foolish man. He studies very hard at this talmudic discussion and its commentaries, and thinks that he is the greatest of his generation, having already attained the peak of perfection."

The problem is paradoxical. Of all great Jewish thinkers, Rambam best understood the need to keep certain, more complex teachings off limits to the ordinary reader, who might become confused and hence lose faith in the tradition. Yet it was this very same Maimonides who pushes for truth – truth from all sources, Jewish or gentile – as the benchmark of enlightenment and the prerequisite for real spiritual attainment. Put another way, he did not view the world or the nuances of Torah in binary black and white fashion.

As the decibel level rises in contemporary religious debate in all communities – Jewish, Christian and Islamic – and the level of intellectual discourse and simple courtesy has radically lessened, the lessons and the legacy of Maimonides are worth remembering and, indeed, following.

Did you hear the one about…?

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

Purim is getting closer, and that means it's time to lighten up. But rather than presenting you with a list of Jewish jokes (just go to Google and type in "Jewish jokes"), I'm going to focus on the tradition of Jews poking fun at authority figures, their enemies and, of course, themselves.

Hershey H. Friedman argues that Jewish humour goes all the way back to the beginning. Granted these biblical examples won't have you rolling in the aisles, but perhaps they planted in the Jewish people their love of humour. Friedman says you will find many examples of "sarcasm, irony, wordplay, humorous names, humorous imagery and exaggeration" in the Torah. The reason: "Humour brings God closer to humankind." [http://tinyurl.com/b3ufs]

Some examples from the Tanach:

• Turnabout: "The Purim story is a comedy in the classic sense," explains the Ohr Somayach site. "All seems set for disaster, and in an instant, everything is turned on its head. This combination of total reversal and perfect timing gives Purim its special flavour of joy." [www.innernet.org.il/article.php?aid=216]

• Humourous situations: When Balaam, the gifted but arrogant seer is sent to curse the Israelites, he refers to himself as "one who hears the sayings of God and knows the knowledge of the Most High," (Numbers 24:16). But it is his donkey, not Balaam, who sees his way blocked by an angel. As Friedman notes, "You might say that God made an ass out of Balaam."

• Sarcasm: When the newly freed Israelites complain about the approaching Egyptian army, they ask Moses "Was there a lack of graves in Egypt, that you took us away to die in the wilderness?" (Exodus 14:11)

The Jewish penchant for arguing with authority figures didn't end in the desert. In "Divine Humour in Talmudic Literature," Friedman points to the many instances that Jews low (Tevye) and great (Abraham, Moses) have "blamed, criticized and haggled" with God. He cites the story of the famous Rabbi Levi Yitzchak of Berditchev, who "once declared to God that if He did not forgive the Jewish people their sins then he would tell the whole world that God's phylacteries [tfillin] were invalid. According to the Talmud, God's phylacteries contain the verse: 'And who is like Your people Israel, a unique nation on earth?' Rabbi Levi exclaimed that if God did not forgive Israel their sins then they were not a 'unique nation on earth,' thus making His phylacteries invalid!" [http://tinyurl.com/88d28]

Eliezer Segal continues the talmudic theme in his article, "Rabbi, Watch out for that Beam!" He explains that the Talmud describes many fanciful accidents in order to open discussions about who is legally at fault. But Segal says you can almost imagine something "quintessentially vaudevillian" about the scenarios presented. There are stories of two people walking, one holding a pot, the other a beam, who of course, collide. Or of five people seated peacefully on a bench until the sixth takes his place and the bench collapses. Segal concludes, "Is it just my own impish irreverence, or are all Talmud students motivated by the hope that the next folio will bring them a fateful new encounter between a rabbi and a banana peel?" [http://tinyurl.com/8oqo5]

"I do not know whether there are many other instances of a people making fun to such a degree of its own character." –Sigmund Freud on Jews and Jewish humour. I found that quote in a fascinating piece by Jules Chametzky who looks at the ability of Jews to laugh at themselves. Here's one repeated by Freud that plays on the stereotype of Jews as dirty: "Two Jews meet in front of the bath house. One sighs and says to the other, 'A year goes by so fast.'"

Chametzky also looks at tales of Chelm, the legendary town inhabited by fools. "One such is of their building a tower at the edge of town from which it would be easier to see the approach of the Messiah. The watchman employed to keep the vigil, the town beggar, was asked what he was being paid. 'Not very much,' he answers, 'But it's steady work.'" [http://tinyurl.com/9kan9]

Kiever shul launches bid for new members

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Specialto The CJN

In the newly renovated basement of the Kiever Congregation, one of two remaining old synagogues in Kensington Market, some 30 people gather around a long festive table laden with trays of fruit, nuts and seeds in celebration of Tu b'Shvat, the birthday of trees.

People alternately bless and consume the bountiful trays of pineapples, mangoes, pomegranates, apples, grapes, figs, dates walnuts and macadamia nuts, to name some of the many varieties of fruit and nuts at this Tu b'Shvat seder.

Shul president David Pinkus, whose association with the Kiever goes back at least 70 years – his father, Isadore, was one of its founders– noted that the Tu b'Shvat seder is a first for the shul.

"It's a unique idea. There hasn't been anything like it in my memory, and I've been coming here since I was a baby."

The seder is a pilot project for a new outreach initiative, said Pinkus, adding that Tu b'Shvat, one of the four new year celebrations in the Jewish calendar, is a very appropriate time to start the new program.

He explained that the Kiever, which received its charter in 1914, when the centre of Jewish life in Toronto was downtown, has seen its congregation dwindle over the years as members died or moved north along the Bathurst Street corridor. For this reason, it was important to hire a professional worker who could spearhead a revitalization of the shul by running educational, social and music programs to attract new members.

The person who has taken up the challenge is Martin (Menashe) Solomon, who comes from a long line of cantors. (His late father, Moshe Zvi, and grandfather, Elimelech Dov, were cantors in Los Angeles and Jerusalem, respectively.) An experienced community worker with a master's degree in social work from Yeshiva University, Solomon is also the former chazzan and spiritual leader of the east-end Riverdale Shul.

His official title is chazzan sheinee (second cantor), as he leads services when honorary cantor Pinchas Gutter is not available. "Mr. Gutter has been the cantor emeritus at the Kiever for many years," Solomon said. "He will always be the first cantor."

The role of the chazzan sheinee will involve outreach to the local Jewish community, Solomon said. "There is this beautiful structure completely available for use by the community. Mr. Pinkus, who has been the driving force in keeping the shul running all these years, understood the importance of renewal."

The position was actually offered to Solomon, a longtime resident of Toronto, after he had left the city. He went back to his native California temporarily before making aliyah to visit his ailing mother, Edith Solomon. She recently died of cancer.

It was during this period that Pinkus approached Solomon to lead the new outreach initiative, Solomon said. "Mr. Pinkus he's been the president of the shul since 1979 and basically looking after most things – wanted to maintain kavod or respect for the old while expanding the appeal to a younger group.

"He said, 'Would you do this? It would be a huge mitzvah. We'll find a way that you'll be able to fulfill that dream of aliyah down the road.'"

Solomon said Ori Carmona, the former baal koreh (Torah reader) at the Riverdale Shul – he now performs this role at the Kiever –was also instrumental in convincing him to return to Toronto.

Another key supporter of the new outreach project is Benjie Cooperband, a former Winnipegger who now assists Pinkus. "I'm there to make sure that there's some continuity once Dave [Pinkus] decides to hang up his hat. I'm there to help him."

He said the outreach program will further increase the shul's utilization by the community.

In particular, he said he wants to publicize the Kiever as a heritage venue for Jewish simchahs, such as weddings and bar and bat mitzvahs. "This is a historical place."

He said revenue from bar and bat mitzvahs – there are about 30 a year – helps cover the shul's upkeep costs.

Cooperband, who books the simchahs, noted that bat mitzvahs are Orthodox, so girls read a Haftorah, rather than a Torah portion. "Last year, my youngest daughter was up there on the bimah doing her Haftorah. It was wonderful," he said.

"We are looking for more opportunities for women to participate in synagogue life," Solomon said.

"Our objective is to carry on the Orthodox formal tradition, but we're open to everyone. We're offering easy access so everyone feels comfortable. We want people to have a genuine spiritual encounter, and at the same time feel a strong link to the past."

Misperceptions are killing Judaism, rabbi says

'We often damage ourselves spiritually in the way we think about Judaism'

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Perceptions that Judaism is a religion based on restrictions, is not spiritual, and is only good for people who need an emotional crutch are killing Judaism, said Rabbi Michael Skobac.

"We often damage ourselves spiritually in the way we think about Judaism."

He said that he has encountered very few Jews who reject Judaism as a whole, but has found that many do tend to reject Judaism based on a number of misconceptions.

"I think the number 1 connection we make about Judaism is that it is a religion. I believe that we don't have positive associations about religions," Rabbi Skobac said during a lecture titled "Is Religion Killing Judaism?" at the Minsker Shul in downtown Toronto recently.

"We might think of things within religion as restrictive, as a thing that holds us back. People might think of Shabbat, for example, as a day of things that you cannot do.

"The truth is that we have to reframe it and think, Shabbat is a day that allows us, and frees us up to do all things we want to be doing," such as focusing on your relationships with your friends, family, God, and other things we put on hold during the work week.

Rabbi Skobac said another association people make with religion, is that it is for the weak.

"We assume often that the only people who should be involved with religion are those that are emotional and psychological cripples."

"If we see religion as something to solve our problems, it is understandable that people would say, it's nice if you need it."

Another misconception about religion is that it is completely separate from spirituality, something that people have become very interested in lately, he said.

"That becomes the killer for religions. If the popular assumption is that religion is not spiritual, and everyone is into spirituality, religion is the last place you want to go."

"A wise man once said, the difference between religion and spirituality is like the difference between reading the menu and eating the meal."

He explained that if we think of Judaism as a religion that requires us to go to shul and pray every day, we're missing the point.

"When we say the Shema, if we are just reading words that tell us we're supposed to love god, that's religion. That's the menu."

But by learning what the words mean and how to love God, we can become spiritual.

"For those people who experience Judaism just as tradition, and ceremonies and customs, it is not very satisfying spiritually. It's when you discover that every single thing we do as Jews is somehow developing our relationship with God [that you can become spiritual]."

He explained that when he was a young hippie with "hair down to his tuchas," he was a politically active idealist who attended protests and was disillusioned with the idea of Judaism and religion.

"To me, religion was the worst thing in the world, because I saw religion as something that divided people and caused most of the problems in the world," said Rabbi Skobac, who added that he was voted the class anti-Semite in high school.

"I had a big chip on my shoulder. Here was a guy, who hated Judaism and hated religion," he said of himself as a young man.

He said one of his high school teachers used to say, "when it comes to politics and religion people speak with a sense of authority aversely proportional to their knowledge."

And a friend said to him, "You know, Skobac, for someone who hates Judaism so much, it's interesting that you almost know nothing about it."

Rabbi Skobac then decided he should educate himself about the religion if he was to have a real position on the subject.

He attended a "special school in New York for wayward Jews," where he learned that

Rabbi Michael Skobac

Judaism and religion is not responsible for all the evil in the world, rather Judaism is a movement dedicated to creating unity in the world.

"What also impressed me was the realization that Jewish idealism has a system to it. I appreciated the fact that as a hippie, my idealism was very sloppy. That I could express my idealism when someone organized a protest or demonstration. But it was very ad hoc. It was very scattered."

"What I appreciated about Judaism was its ability to weave our idealism into our lives 24 hours a day, seven days a week."

Doctor saves lives in Ethiopian hospital

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Among travellers to the Ethiopian capital of Addis Ababa, Dr. Rick Hodes' Friday night dinners have become somewhat legendary. Stories have been written about how the American-born doctor for the Joint Distribution Committee welcomes visitors to his home for a vegetarian Shabbat meal, and how travellers of all stripes sit together and enjoy the friendly ambience created by the good doctor.

When Sari Stitt decided to accompany her husband, Allan, to Ethiopia for his business meetings, she decided it would be a good idea to get in touch with the doctor and join him on Shabbat.

Recently returned from Addis, Stitt declares that Hodes, who's lived in the eastern African state since 1985, is an inspiring figure. Not only does he minister to the health needs of the Falash Mora – Ethiopian Jews who converted to Christianity over the past century and who now await repatriation to Israel – he also provides medical services to the wider population. He helps the local Mother Theresa's Mission for Sick and Dying Destitutes (MTM) as a volunteer, taking care of gravely ill patients.

He obtains badly needed – and hard to get – medications for MTM's patients, sometimes taking money out of his own pocket to do so. Relying on his contacts around the world, he arranges surgeries for some of the patients outside Ethiopia. And the Talmud-citing doctor has adopted five young Ethiopian boys and provided a home for 10 more.

Stitt met Hodes only briefly a few days before their Shabbat dinner. She'd already had her fill of the touristy life in and around Addis. She had toured many Christian sites and was more or less tired of driving around the countryside visiting churches.

During her ventures outside the sheltered confines of the Sheraton Hotel, she was exposed to a grinding poverty that was beyond anything she had witnessed before.

Once, she came upon what appeared to be a beast of burden piled high with branches for firewood. When she got closer, she saw it was a woman beneath the heavy load.

The poor outside Addis have nothing, she said. Those better-off have tin roofs on their mud huts.

By Tuesday of her week there, while her husband met with colleagues to instruct them on the finer points of conflict resolution and mediation, she was asking Hodes what she could do as a volunteer.

He immediately suggested, "I have lots of children at my home. Can you teach them English?" she recounted.

Stitt spent four days with the boys, and she quickly became attached to them and impressed with their good spirits – despite the hardships and illnesses they endured. Most noticeable was their good nature, their desire to learn and their appreciation of the little things in life.

Sari Stitt with Ethiopian children

Hodes lives in a three-bedroom house in a gated community. The kids sleep in two of the rooms. "They're happy to sleep on the floor," she said.

Not all of the boys are orphans. Some were left by their destitute parents at the MTM when they could no longer take care of them. Some suffer from cancer, others from tuberculosis of the spine or other maladies.

One of the boys – "Duke" as he's known – is only nine. After his mother died, his father brought him to Addis Ababa. While Duke played marbles in the dirt street, his father walked away. When Duke looked up from his game, he was alone.

He lived on the street by his wits for months until he was brought to the mission. Hodes met him there and decided to adopt him.

In an e-mail interview from Addis, Hodes said he adopted the boys because "I'm trying to help a few people."

In his home, he said, he practises Judaism and observes the Jewish holidays, but he welcomes children of all faiths. In Ethiopia, there is virtually no anti-Semitism, and what's more, Ethiopians feel close to Israel. "There are long and old ties going back to Solomon and Sheba. People still talk about how Ethiopia stood still rooting for Israel during the Six Day War [in 1967]."

Hodes doesn't consider himself an ambassador of the Jewish people, "but I think perhaps I show that at least this Jew cares about all the people here."

As for the adopted kids, they "feel closer to Judaism. Three have gone to the Jewish day school in Dallas, Texas, when they were there for spine surgeries. They call my mother Bubbie.

"I want to expose them to the nice things about Judaism and they can decide where they want to go. The other kids I am helping can do what they like."

Stitt took groups of Hodes' boys with her for conversational English lessons at the Sheraton Hotel, where she treated them to exotic fare – hamburgers, fries and soft drinks – which they loved.

Though she spent only a few days with them, she was impressed by how the boys lived, something like "a brotherhood in action."

Her enthusiasm for him knows few limits: "I think he could go down in history books as one of the greatest humanitarians of all time," she said.

Freedom of speech said the issue

Bronstein sloughs off the phone call and he does not feel intimidated by the legal manoeuvres. "I think it's perfectly valid for people to use the legal system," he said. At the same time, he has received unsolicited calls from lawyers offering their services – some pro bono – if he has to fight in court or at the human rights commission for his right to publish the cartoons, he said.

In its Feb. 9 issue, the JFP published several of the Danish cartoons that have inflamed parts of the Muslim world, including one that depicts Muhammad with a lit bomb in his turban.

Syed Soharwardy, president of the ISCC, which filed the human rights complaint, told reporters the cartoons promote hatred against Muslims. The Muslim Council of Calgary has lodged a complaint with Calgary police about the images.

Bronstein maintains that what is at stake is free speech, asking, "Where do you draw the line" in publishing images one religious group finds offensive? "Are you allowed to talk about Muhammad in the context of political criticism? Are you allowed to talk about Islam in the context of political criticism?" he asked.

Ezra Levant, publisher of the Western Standard, told Canadian Press that "diversity means we don't have to obey one person's religious laws."

Bronstein said he published the cartoons to provide background and context to the eruptions of violence that occurred in the Muslim world.

Israel could use a constitution: ex-MK

Israel needs a constitution because of its diversity, but Israelis can manage without one, the former deputy speaker of the Knesset said last week.

In a speech at Temple Sinai, Naomi Chazan said constitutions are important in countries such as in Israel, where there are disagreements on the major political, social and religious issues of the day.

But a constitution can't be a substitute for sound government policy, she added.

Nevertheless, a constitution could be useful as Israel grapples with numerous pressing issues, from the status of some 400,000 new Russian immigrants who are not considered halachically Jewish to the problem of corruption in politics.

In the absence of a constitution, Israel relies on 11 basic laws, which carry constitutional weight and cover such areas as the structure of government, the status of Jerusalem and human rights.

Chazan, chair of the Association for Freedom of Religion in Israel, said a constitution should ensure that the state will not intervene in religious matters.

Whatever happens on the constitutional front, Israel must remain a democratic state with a Jewish majority, Chazan said.

Yet Israel is also a state of all its citizens, including its one million-strong Arab minority, she added.

In a brief survey of Israeli attempts since 1949 to draft a constitution, she said it was not a high-priority matter because "we were otherwise preoccupied" with questions of war and peace.

But the nature of party politics in Israel ultimately accounts for why it does not have a constitution today, Chazan added.

Religious parties, especially haredi ones, oppose a constitution on the grounds that Israel already has a "divine constitution," the Torah, she said, and secular politicians have been unwilling to challenge this dogma because they need the religious parties' support when coalition governments are formed. Chazan's appearance was co-sponsored by ARZA Canada and Kolel.

Author explores reasons for lapses in Jewish observance

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Faranak Margolese has always considered herself fairly tolerant and open-minded, but the importance of those qualities was driven home to her unexpectedly when she was researching her new book, Off the Derech: Why Observant Jews Leave Judaism.

The 33-year-old author – who lives in Jerusalem with her husband David, a native of Vancouver, and their four-month-old daughter – initially thought that people made religious choices based on their beliefs.

"That is not the case," she said in a phone interview from her home last week.

The most prevalent cause of lapses in Jewish observance – which she measured by commitment to keeping Shabbat and kashrut – were negative feelings about Yiddishkeit, she wrote. "Negative relationships with the practitioners of Judaism tend to create negative feelings toward Judaism that compromise observance."

After surveying more than 500 people and accumulating more than 1,000 pages of interviews, she had acquired many stories about negative experiences involving judgmentalism or disappointing behaviour on the part of family members, teachers and rabbis to back her conclusions.

Her information-dense yet very readable book – whose title uses the Hebrew word "derech" to refer to the "path" of observance – is already in its second printing following its release in November by Devora Publishing. The author is scheduled to speak at

Faranak Margolese

Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Congregation in June.

Her idea for the project grew out of the realization when she was dating her husband that most of her friends were formerly observant Jews. She wrote that although there have been no formal studies on the phenomenon, many people feel it has reached "epidemic proportions."

Margolese, a graduate of Stern College and Columbia University – where she received a master of fine arts degree in nonfiction creative writing – was also intrigued by Orthodox Jews who are outwardly observant but feeling disconnected.

> The most prevalent cause of lapses in Jewish observance – which she measured by commitment to keeping Shabbat and kashrut – were negative feelings about Yiddishkeit

Recently, she was at a local café and noticed an American seminary student – modestly dressed with sleeves covering her elbows – who was checking messages on her cellphone as she recited by rote the five-minute prayer that follows meals.

"I think that was one of the most striking things I've ever seen," said Margolese. "When you see somebody who outwardly looks the way she looks, you expect the inner experience of their Judaism to reflect that reality. She's saying the words, but there's no concentration on it."

When the inner connection goes, Margolese said, "it's not that long until the ritual follows – maybe not for her, but [possibly] for her children."

One of her interview subjects said that she tells her children that they have to pray, but nobody likes it, Margolese recalled. "There were many statements like that. They are very troubling."

Although Off the Derech addresses issues within the Orthodox world, with which she is the most familiar, Margolese believes her findings are applicable to the greater Jewish community.

"No matter who you are," she said, "it's important to let your kids ask questions, and it's important to answer those questions.

"All the principles are relevant, [although] the way those principles are expressed might be different. For the Conservative or Reform Jew who rejects their child over religious issues, I think there would be the same sort of repercussions."

The subject is one that Margolese is passionate about, and she is donating her book royalties to charity.

The product of a traditional Sephardi home in Los Angeles, Margolese is the great-granddaughter of the former chief rabbi of Tehran. Interestingly, neither her father nor any of his five siblings remained strictly halachically observant. However, Margolese and two of her three siblings as well as a number of their more than 30 cousins have become observant.

"I think my father did have some of the [negative] experiences, and I suspect his siblings did as well," she said.

Margolese grew up with warm, positive feelings about Judaism absorbed from her parents and the Orthodox day school she attended. She became halachically observant at a women's yeshiva she attended in Israel after high school, but was disillusioned after she was faced with severe judgmentalism by teachers over incidents she describes in the book.

"If we [all] lived Judaism the way it's supposed to be lived, we would be living a very inspiring Judaism and we wouldn't see as many people leaving the path as we do now," she said.

New principal believes in importance of diversity

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Janet Nish-Lapidus is reluctant to admit it, but she pursued her bachelor of education degree in the mid-1970s because it was a practical choice.

Having majored in psychology at York University, she went on to the University of Toronto to study education. "Little did I know it would be a field I would fall in love with," she said in her office at the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School (DJDS), situated in the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, where she became principal at the beginning of January.

"In all honesty [my choice] was by default, and here I am 30 years later still involved and excited by what I do."

A native of Montreal, Nish-Lapidus has lived and worked in Toronto, Prince Albert, Sask., Halifax, and London, Ont., where she was principal of the London Community Hebrew Day School for eight years. She and her husband Philip Lapidus returned to Toronto 2½ years ago, and she served as vice-principal at DJDS from this past September until taking on her current position.

The couple, whose two children are now adults, wanted the lifestyle of a smaller city when their family was young, she said.

But the transition when they moved back was not difficult.

"I'm a city person," she said. "We were here often, even living away."

And the school felt familiar from the first day she began teaching there, she added. "It offered everything I find exciting and stimulating."

One of the elements that excites her is diversity: On her four-page curriculum vitae, Nish-Lapidus has 10 items illustrating her "commitment to equity and diversity issues."

Janet Nish-Lapidus

The 103 students at the school make up "a wonderfully diverse community, and we celebrate that," said Nish-Lapidus. Families who send their children to the school, which opened seven years ago, range from unaffiliated to modern Orthodox in terms of Jewish practice, and include racially mixed, same-sex, interfaith and single-parent families.

There is also diversity in student learning styles and abilities, she noted.

"Diversity is important because it opens up your mind to other ways of looking at things," she explained.

Nish-Lapidus, who earned her master of education degree at Mount Saint Vincent University in Halifax in 1996 and completed her principal's qualifications in 2001 at the University of Western Ontario, believes that administrators should be accessible. "Collaboration is very important for me... I think growth happens when people work together."

Students, she said, should be excited about learning, and should feel successful. The curriculum should inspire and challenge them, and the material be relevant to who they are, she added. "Our responsibility as educators is to create a school culture that will make that happen."

The DJDS has a "culture of respect, excitement and enthusiasm," she said.

Because the school is the only Jewish day school in the downtown area, parents "have a real drive to be involved and are committed to the success of the school."

In fact, she noted, it's due to a parent initiative that the DJDS is inaugurating a new middle school next year, in the form of a combined Grade 7 and 8 class. The school currently offers classes from senior kindergarten through Grade 6.

One parent of a Grade 6 student has decided to honour her grandparents by selling a valuable carpet that she inherited from them and donating the proceeds to the middle school, the school said in a release.

"Our parents are very involved and very excited about the vision of the school," said Nish-Lapidus. "I'm sure that exists elsewhere too, but I know that's what makes the community here so special."

WE'RE GROWING!: Grade 6 students at the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School react excitedly to the news their school is opening a middle school next fall. Shul renovation moves ahead slowly

Beth Tzedec Congregation is planning an ambitious renovation, including extensive upgrades to its school facilities, pending approval for rezoning and further fundraising.

The project, which has been in the talking stages for about a decade, is expected to cost approximately $25 million and to take two years to complete.

At minimum, however, the synagogue's aging infrastructure, including plumbing, must be repaired, said Blake Teichman, a co-chair of the building project, at a recent public meeting at Beth Tzedec. "We are committed to not put a shovel in the ground until we have a comfort level that we're well on the way [to our funding goal]."

The repairs alone are expected to cost approximately $5 million, and, to a certain extent, have already begun.

Of the cost for the total project, $5 million will be contributed by United Synagogue Day School and $5 million by Beth Tzedec members, Teichman said. The balance, of which more than $6 million has been pledged so far, will come from donations, he added.

Plans include better school facilities such as larger classrooms, a playing field and a full-size gymnasium, as well as underground parking to replace the current parking lot and increase the number of spaces.

The 425 students at USDS' southern campus will have use of the existing facilities while new classrooms are being built on a third floor that will be added to the building. Once new classrooms are completed, the school will use them while the old ones are being refurbished, said Rick Gosine, of Dalton Construction.

"We are targeting opening of the first preschool aspects of the school for fall 2008, with the full school opening in September 2009," said Lawrie Lubin, co-chair of the construction subcommittee of the building expansion and renovation committee.

The Beth Tzedec building, which is more than 50 years old, has an "antiquated" mechanical system and its original kitchen, Harold Wolfe, a member of the renovation committee, said at the meeting.

USDS sells Richmond Hill building

The sale closed in December, but USDS and Beit Rayim Synagogue, which rents space from the school for its congregation and Hebrew school, have use of the 27,000-square-foot facility, on Bayview Avenue north of Weldrick Road, until the end of August, said Allen Gales, president of USDS' board of directors.

The majority of the 200-plus USDS students at the Richmond Hill branch are expected to continue at the school's Bayview campus, at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, in September, although registration for next year is just beginning, Gales said. The school also has a southern campus at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

A new northern branch will open at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Lebovic campus at Bathurst and Weldrick for the 2008-09 school year.

Discussions are under way with Beit Rayim about a partnership at the new northern location, said Gales.

For now, the 230-family congregation is looking for temporary rental quarters, probably for an interim period of two years, said Beit Rayim president Karen Baron. Its Hebrew school has applied for permits to be housed in a public school for the next two years, she added.

Robins adapts lessons to her students' ages

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Donna Robins says she is a professional development junkie.

From 1991 to 2000, for example, she attended about half a dozen educational summer conferences put on by the Coalition for the Advancement of Jewish Education, a North American Jewish educators' association better known as CAJE.

Currently, she's enrolled in the Tikun Chaim special-education certification program run by the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE).

A public health nurse by training, Robins began her second career at Holy Blossom Temple Religious School 18 years ago. The third-generation member of the congregation "fell in love with teaching" within weeks. "I love the kids, and I love watching them grow, especially [when they] grow Jewishly."

Robins still teaches at Holy Blossom, where she also co-ordinates the volunteer segment of the Grade 10 confirmation class curriculum and co-teaches a tfillah class for special needs kids. The synagogue has funded some of her professional development programs.

The 63-year-old mother and grandmother also teaches Grade 7 at Temple Sinai Religious School, does secretarial work for her lawyer husband, and spent two weeks as a camp nurse last summer at Camp George.

Three years ago, she finished co-writing a literature-based Jewish values curriculum for students in kindergarten to Grade 3 as part of a BJE Etgar grant.

> A lesson from the teacher: "There is something good in every single child, no matter the behaviour you see. You just have to look for it. There is always something worth praising."

Last November, Robins was among 64 North American educators to receive the Grinspoon-Steinhardt Award for Excellence in Jewish Education at the General Assembly of United Jewish Communities. The annual award provides a $1,500 (US) stipend for professional development and $1,000 (US) cash.

Robins, whose speech is punctuated by her frequent hearty chuckle, is utterly serious when she explains why she is using her award stipend for the Tikun Chaim program.

"I did this because every single child has a special need," she said. "Every child is an individual."

She believes strongly in getting to know each student, as well as getting to know what works with them as a group. Conversely, she believes in letting students know who she is. "Don't be afraid to let them know you're human," she said.

With her younger students, Robins says she can do more of the "fun, silly" projects like "Hairy Harry," her Tu b'Shvat art staple. Students decorate styrofoam cups to create faces, fill them with potting soil, and plant parsley seeds inside. When the parsley grows, it becomes Harry's "hair."

"They get a big kick out of it," she said. "And the parsley can be used for Passover."

However, she noted, "You have to be a little more conventional with the Grade 7s."

Because she teaches her confirmation class in the evening when students have already had a full day of school, Robins tries to incorporate activity into her lesson when she can.

"Something as simple as a puzzle," she said. "I give them a puzzle piece when they come in. They get up and put the puzzle pieces together. It's usually a quote… and [we] go from there."

With her younger students, when she teaches tza'ar baalei chayim (laws regarding the treatment of animals), Robins brings one of her three dogs to class .

She denies that she is particularly creative as a teacher. "I'd love to say [I am]. It's just that I read a lot. I listen. I look at what works for other people and sometimes I borrow it, and sometimes I jump off from there."

Two papers, two views on Hamas

Recent editorials on Hamas in the Globe and Mail and the New York Times provided a stark contrast in views.

While the Globe said a Hamas-led Palestinian government should not receive aid dollars until it moderates its policies – which the paper doubted would actually happen – the Times argued that a Hamas-led Palestinian government should be funded so as not to impose hardships on the Palestinians and in the hope that Hamas will become moderate.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The Feb. 15 Globe editorial, "See Hamas for what it is," said that it's unlikely the pressures of governing will force Hamas to moderate: "Just as likely it will see its election victory as an endorsement of its program (if that's the word for such a mission of violence and hate). Hamas has already given itself credit for last year's Israeli withdrawal from the Gaza Strip. Its sense of empowerment is unlikely to wane once it holds the reins of power."

The Globe concluded: "The West must take an unblinkered view of Hamas. In practice, that means withholding all aid from a Hamas-run Palestinian government until it forswears terrorism as a method and the destruction of Israel as a goal."

The Times editorial of the same day, "The Right Way to Pressure Hamas," warned against withholding funds from a Hamas-led government: "If the new government fails to deliver because it puts continued terrorism over the well-being of the Palestinian people, it may indeed be booted out of office. But a Hamas that could explain continued Palestinian misery by a deliberate American-Israeli plan to reverse the democratic verdict of the polls would be likely to become only stronger."

The Times noted that the U.S. government has denied (along with Israel) any plan "to reverse the democratic verdict." But it ignored the possibility that once in power, Hamas may subvert any future democratic processes that could see it "booted out of office."

The Times editorial is silent on Hamas' anti-Jewish racism and its pledge to "liberate" all of Palestine. In contrast, the Globe quotes extensively from the farewell videos of suicide bombers, currently posted on the Hamas website: "This operation is revenge against the sons of monkeys and pigs... Jihad is the only way to liberate Palestine – all of Palestine – from the impurity of the Jews."

The Times editorial also endorsed Russian President Vladimir Putin's decision to meet with Hamas. The paper only faulted Putin on a relatively minor procedural issue – how he took the West by surprise with his invitation. But in terms of substance, the Times expressed hope that Putin "prods Hamas toward renouncing terrorism, accepting Israel's right to exist and reviving the peace process."

Others argue that this position is naive, even foolishly naive. They see Putin's move as a cynical stab at U.S. Mideast policy, a gesture amounting to appeasement, and a betrayal of its membership in the Quartet (along with the United States, European Union and the United Nations), which pledged not to negotiate with Hamas unless it first meets three essential conditions (underscored by Prime Minister Stephen Harper in his Feb. 14 phone conversation with PA President Mahmoud Abbas): renounce violence; recognize Israel; and accept previous agreements (for instance, the "road map" peace plan, which is premised on a two-state solution).

The Globe editorial denounced Putin's invitation as "the first crack in the diplomatic attempt to freeze [Hamas] out of international society."

Washington Post columnist Richard Cohen ("A Disturbing Invitation," Feb. 14) was less diplomatic than the Globe editorial board when, referring implicitly to Putin's refusal to recognize Hamas as a terrorist group, he caustically depicted the irony in Putin's manoeuvre: "Putin, I think, would not have been quite so quick to extend a welcome to the Chechen rebels he considers to be terrorists, but the murderers of Jews are apparently a different matter. This, after all, is a long Russian tradition."

Tory offers financial assistance for day school parents

Parents sending their children to Jewish day schools will receive some financial assistance if the Progressive Conservative Party forms the next provincial government, party leader John Tory announced last weekend.

Tory announced at his party's policy conference in Niagara Falls that he viewed the matter as a "fairness issue" but did not get into details about whether such a program would involve tax credits or grants, indicating that such financial assistance would likely go to parents rather than schools.

A tax credit for parents in all private schools was brought in by former Ontario premier Mike Harris' government but was cancelled when the Liberals were elected in 2003.

Silence worse than racism, expert says

By LAUREN BRESLIN
Special to The CJN

Combating hate and racism in Canada is about more than absorbing the lessons of the Holocaust, Karen Mock, executive director of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation, said.

She was speaking at a recent York University anti-racism conference titled Mending a Broken World: Lessons of the Holocaust, aimed at future educators from Canada and Europe.

"It's about how am I, when I go home, going to take a stand to combat racism and hate. How am I going to take a stand to help young people recognize what kind of action can happen locally, regionally and internationally?" she said

Mock urged her audience to break the silence about racism. Quoting the late Rabbi Joachim Prinz, an influential Jewish leader and civil rights advocate, Mock said, "Bigotry and hatred are not the most urgent problem. The most urgent, the most disgraceful, the most shameful and the most tragic problem is silence."

Rabbi Prinz spoke those words at the March on Washington in Aug. 28, 1963, just before his friend, the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr,. delivered his "I have a dream" speech.

Mock said the power to change attitudes in the future lies with young people in multicultural early childhood education programs, and she stressed that it's important for educators to understand the dynamics of hate.

"The targets of hatred are characterized as taking advantage of the rest of society," she said.

"When people are feeling insecure, when they're frightened, when they're looking for people to blame for their problems – economic problems, security problems, you name it – inevitably it leads to the scapegoating of any identifiable minority."

"Throughout the history of the western world, Jews have been traditional scapegoats, and anti-Semitism can be considered to be the prototype of racism," she noted.

Mock has organized educator study tours, in which groups of Canadian educators travelled to Germany, Poland and Israel to experience the kind of Holocaust education one cannot learn in a classroom.

While national director of the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada, Mock compiled a manual called Taking Action Against Hate, with the subtitle Protection, Prevention and Partnership.

"Protection means protection of the laws – strengthening our anti-hate laws and our human rights laws," she says. "Prevention – that's education in all its forms, right from the earliest childhood level."

Partnership means a show of solidarity with anyone who is like-minded in the fight against racism. "It behooves us not to use the tactics of the perpetrator in disparaging them and competing with them."

Mock believes optimism, along with hope for a better future for our children, is key in combating racism. "You've got to be a cup-half-full person," she said. "We have to be committed, as educators, to be change agents."

Mending a Broken World: Lessons of the Holocaust was sponsored by the Mark and Gail Appel Program in Holocaust and Anti-racism Education and was a joint initiative of the Centre for Jewish Studies and the Canadian Centre for German and European Studies at York.

Birthright applications outpace available spots

JTA

Birthright israel has received many more applications for its upcoming trips than it has spaces available.

Some 14,000 young Jews applied for 8,000 spots in the program's spring/summer 2006 trips in just the first 12 hours of registration on Feb. 8.

The organization provides free trips to Israel for Jews aged 18 to 26. In the six years since its founding, birthright has brought 98,000 people from 45 countries to Israel. An upcoming trip will include the program's 100,000th participant.

"The level of demand is unprecedented and well exceeds our financial capability to accommodate the majority of those who currently wish to go on Taglit-birthright israel trips," said Susie Gelman, chair of the birthright israel Foundation. Taglit is the Hebrew name for the program.

"As Taglit-birthright israel grows rapidly and develops into a community-supported organization, we hope that our friends will support us in enabling more young Jews to participate in the Taglit-birthright israel experience, so that we can send the 100,000th participant and plan for the next 100,000."

Elizabeth Sokolsky, the Toronto-based vice-president of education and operations for birthright israel, said the situation in Canada is relatively the same.

In a week since registration opened, about 2,500 Canadians applied for only 1,000 spots available on trips this summer, she said.

"This is the first time we've had so many applicants so quickly. This is the largest onslaught of applications we've had over the period of one day, one week," Sokolsky said.

She said that applicants are dealt with on a first-come, first-serve basis, while the others are put on a waiting list.

Try something new: pita with shakshuka

Soldiers on their way to their bases all over Israel were delighted recently to find that the sandwich bars manned by the Association for the welfare of IDF soldiers were handing out a pita with shakshuka (see recipe below) instead of the usual sandwich.

SHAKSHUKA

2 lb. fresh tomatoes, unpeeled and cut in quarters, or one 28-oz. can tomatoes
6 cloves garlic, roughly diced
2 tsp. salt, or to taste
1 tsp. sweet paprika
2 tsp. tomato paste
¼ cup vegetable oil
6 large eggs

Place the tomatoes, garlic, salt, paprika, tomato paste and vegetable oil in a small saucepan. Bring to a simmer and cook, uncovered, over low heat until thick, for about 30 minutes, stirring occasionally.

Ladle the tomato sauce into a greased 12-inch frying pan. Bring to a simmer and break the eggs over the tomatoes. Gently break the yolks with a fork. Cover and continue to cook for about 3 to 4 minutes, until the eggs are set. Bring the frying pan directly to the table. Set it on a trivet and spoon out the shakshuka. Makes six servings.

Israeli soldiers take a break to enjoy some pita and shakshuka.

Chinese, the kosher way

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Chinese cooking has always been a favourite of mine. I studied with Chinese cooking teachers and also learned from a Chinese exchange student we hosted. I taught classes in Chinese cooking for many years and consider myself to be an excellent Chinese cook.

But there is no one who can do it the way my late friend and one-time neighbour Sadell Sloan could.

She was a fabulous Chinese cook who put together the most amazing dinners. She often made 10-course Chinese meals for our dinner club, and when she donated one of these dinners for a synagogue fundraising auction, it sold for an outrageous sum.

Sadell and I would often sit outside chatting on a Friday morning and, on the spur of the moment, decide to make a Chinese Shabbat dinner. She had a duck in her freezer, I had ribs. She'd make the duck and steamed buns, I'd make the ribs. And off we'd go. Lucky were the guests who were invited to those Shabbat dinners.

The wise Jewish cook will experiment with Chinese cooking one dish at a time rather than immediately preparing an elaborate dinner. If you're new to Chinese cooking, serve one dish as part of a more traditional dinner. As you become more familiar and comfortable with the cuisine, add more dishes until you have a complete meal.

SADELL'S SPARE RIBS

For her birthday, my daughter Amy requested a dinner consisting of nothing but these ribs – mounds of them! Hoisin and five-spice powder are available in most large supermarkets.

5 tbsp. hoisin sauce
3 tbsp. soy sauce
¼ tsp. five-spice powder
2 tbsp. sherry or dry white wine
1 tbsp. sugar
¼ tsp. garlic powder
4 lb. flanken ribs
1 16-oz. jar honey

Mix hoisin sauce, soy sauce, five-spice powder, sherry or wine, sugar and garlic powder together and marinate the ribs in this sauce for at least one hour and preferably overnight.

Place a rack (cake cooling rack) over a roasting pan. Place 1½ to 2 cups water in the bottom of the pan. Remove ribs from marinade and place on rack over the roasting pan. Roast ribs for 50 minutes at 350. Don't let the ribs touch the water. After about 25 minutes, baste the ribs with half the marinade. After 50 minutes, remove roaster from oven, dip the ribs in honey and replace on the rack. Turn oven up to 450 and bake another 10-15 minutes, basting with the remainder of the marinade. Makes 4-6 servings.

SPICY CHILLED CHINESE NOODLES

This dish can be made the day before and refrigerated until ready to serve.

16 oz. spaghetti
1½ tbsp. sesame oil
4-6 scallions, green part only, in ¼-in. pieces
2 tbsp. toasted sesame seeds

Sauce:
¼ cup soy sauce
¼ cup beef or chicken broth
2 tbsp. tehina
3 tbsp. white vinegar
2 tbsp. oriental sesame oil
1 tbsp. sugar
1 tsp. grated ginger hot pepper sauce to taste
green onions for garnish

Cook spaghetti until just tender. Drain well and sprinkle with 1½ tsp. of the sesame oil. Place spaghetti in serving bowl and add the scallions. In a food processor combine the sauce ingredients and mix until smooth. Pour over the spaghetti and top with sesame seeds when ready to serve. Garnish with chopped green onions (green part only).

Note: To toast sesame seeds, place in a frying pan and shake over heat for a minute or two until golden brown. Watch carefully because they can burn quickly. Makes 6 servings.

LEMON CHICKEN

Chicken:
6 boneless chicken breasts
½ cup cornstarch
½ tsp. pepper or to taste
¼ cup water
4 egg yolks, slightly beaten
3 cups oil
4 green onions, sliced

Lemon Sauce:
1½ cups water
½ cup lemon juice, preferably fresh
3½ tbsp. packed brown sugar
3 tbsp. cornstarch
3 tbsp. honey
2 tsp. chicken bouillon powder
1 tsp. grated, pared fresh ginger root

Pound chicken breasts lightly to flatten them. Combine cornstarch and pepper in a small bowl. Gradually blend in water and egg yolks.

Pour oil into wok and heat over high heat until oil reaches 375. Dip chicken breasts, one at a time, into cornstarch-egg yolk mixture. Fry breasts, two or three at a time, in hot oil until golden, about 5 minutes.

Drain breasts on absorbent paper. Keep warm while cooking remaining chicken. Cut each breast into three or four pieces and arrange on serving plate. Sprinkle with green onion slices.

Combine all sauce ingredients in a medium saucepan and mix thoroughly. Cook over medium heat, stirring constantly, until sauce boils and thickens, about five minutes. Pour over chicken and serve. (Makes 6 servings)

Canadians to help with Jerusalem facelift

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Canadians, both Jewish and non-Jewish, are undertaking a $2-million project to help revitalize Jerusalem's city centre, which has been in serious decline for years and especially since the start of the intifadah.

The Royal Bank of Canada will host the campaign's kickoff in Toronto March 7, under the chairmanship of its vice-president for governmental affairs, Charles Coffey, an honorary member of the board of the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada, the organization overseeing the campaign.

It's the biggest project undertaken by the foundation in Canada in at least 10 years, said Monica Berger, the Montreal-based national executive director and wife of David Berger, former Canadian ambassador to Israel.

Former Israeli finance minister Dan Meridor, now international chair of the Jerusalem Foundation, will be guest speaker at the invitation-only launch. Ya'acov (Cobie) Brosh, the Israeli consul general in Toronto, will also speak.

David Azrieli, president of Montreal-based Canpro Investments, a major real estate developer in Israel and the new president of the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada, will finance a major part of the project, said Steve Solomon, director of the Canadian desk of the foundation at its Jerusalem headquarters.

Solomon said a series of events over the coming year will be held in Canada emphasizing "the centrality of Jerusalem to the world's three major monotheistic religious groups.

"Funds raised from these events will be utilized not only to revitalize the city centre, but also to fund important services and activities which will benefit all the residents of this unique city."

On March 8, Meridor will be in Ottawa to speak to supporters there.

"Over the past decade, many of the quality businesses formerly located in the heart of Jerusalem have either been driven out of business or relocated to more secure indoor locations, turning the city centre into a commercial ghost town," Solomon said. The Ben Yehuda pedestrian mall has been particularly hard hit.

The foundation is working in partnership with the city, which has drawn up plans for a redevelopment of the downtown core.

Renowned architect Moshe Safdie, an honorary member of the foundation's Canadian board, is expected to volunteer his expertise to the project as well.

Canadian funds will be directed to the rejuvenation of Zion Square, a busy gathering place for residents and tourists, as well as the site of large political rallies. Among the physical enhancements will be the installation of a contemporary piece of art by artist Ron Arad. The funds will also go to community outreach programs that serve the mainly young inhabitants of the area.

Zahal Square, which connects the Old City, city hall and the Mammilla neighbourhood, has already been redesigned with contributions from the Jerusalem Foundation's American branch. Historic Davidka Square and surroundings has also been revamped.

The master plan also calls for the creation of new town squares and incentives to encourage more students and young people to live in the area, such as rental subsidies.

The Bezalel Academy of Art is to be relocated from Mount Scopus to the city centre, which it is hoped will also promote more cultural activity.

Three major intersections along Jaffa Road, from the city entrance in the west to Zahal Square in the east, will be the sites of attractive, modern squares. A light-railway transportation system is also being constructed, and eventually most traffic will be redirected from the city core.

A suspension bridge designed by Spanish architect Santiago Calatrava will extend over the entrance to the city becoming the modern "Gate to Jerusalem."

In addition, much of the city's underground infrastructure, some of its dating back to the British Mandate, has been replaced.

The next campaign event is in Montreal April 4, when Manny Batshaw, who was president of the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada for many years, will be honoured.

Arabs, Muslims and Jews dialogue in Hamilton

By ABIGAIL CUKIER
Special to the News

HAMILTON – Arab, Muslim and Jewish leaders in Hamilton want to let the community know respectful dialogue and understanding is possible between the three groups.

Although they are just starting to get their message out, they have already felt the impact of their efforts.

Ali Cheaib, who came to Canada 18 years ago from southern Lebanon, is president of the Hamilton Council of Canadian Arabs.

"We are not distancing ourselves from Arab-Israeli issues, but we are trying to find a way to talk and not confront each other," he said. "Instead of looking at a person as a Jew or an Arab, we are getting behind the label. We put a wall up – we are taking that wall down.

"I see myself becoming more mature, being able to open up to a community that I had certain preconceived notions about. I can see these melting away.

"I hope the same can be said about my Jewish friends."

The Committee for Hamilton Arab, Muslim and Jewish Dialogue was formed in September after a Hamilton Police Board's forum about the police chief's controversial trip to Israel. When vicious invective between Palestinian and Israeli supporters brought the meeting to an abrupt end, Cheaib's eyes met Lorne Finkelstein's across the room.

"We were both in dismay. I contacted him the next day and we agreed this can't go on," said Finkelstein. "This didn't reflect the way we behave in Hamilton from either side. It didn't represent the majority."

The two men knew each other through their positions on the Strengthening Hamilton Community Initiative, a group aimed at promoting equality and ending discrimination in Hamilton.

Finkelstein admitted the relationship was "testy at first.

"Then we decided we have no control over Middle East events and, while we have passions about events in the Middle East, we shouldn't bring those grievances to Hamilton. There is no room for invective, inciteful dialogue."

The two men spent two hours having coffee one Sunday afternoon. Cheaib spoke about living in Lebanon during the 1982 Israeli incursion and Finkelstein shared stories of anti-Semitism in Hamilton.

The committee they started includes Javid Mirza, president of the Muslim Association of Hamilton, Khaled Balika, vice-president of the Muslim Association of Hamilton, Hussein Hamdani, founder and chair of the Ihya Foundation, and Gerry Fisher, executive director of the Ul... Federation of Hamilton.

The group has met five times, mostly to try to get to know one another. Members don't discuss the Middle East and are dismayed at the media's tendency to turn to inciteful groups for sources.

"It's a never-ending game. With both sides competing for public opinion, we are going down a path that doesn't get us anywhere," Cheaib said. "Why not get people who really want to solve problems to sit down and talk. We want to have an understanding of each other's fears and sensitivities and see that these get respected."

Last week, committee members organized a meeting of the executives of their respective organizations.

Morteza Jafarpour, a Muslim, and the executive director of Settlement and Integration Services Organization (SISO), shared his memories of growing up in Iran, where his best friend was a Jew and his college roommate was Armenian. He asked, "What happened to those days?"

The dialogue committee will continue meeting monthly and the joint executives will meet every three months. They agreed they will continue to work to get to know each other and discuss sensitive issues together.

"Nobody had expectations that we would reach an accord, nothing was asked except to meet again," Finkelstein said. "This is a first for Hamilton. We think it's a first for Canada. We're not aware of it being done elsewhere."

Other ideas include forming a youth choir of Jewish, Arab and Muslim students who will perform songs of peace. Glen Mallory, conductor of the Hamilton Philharmonic Youth Orchestra, has committed his orchestra's accompaniment.

"We want to serve to alleviate these mis... conceptions about people and communicate this to the community at large. We don't espouse to solving the problem, but we are hopeful," Cheaib said. "We have accomplished a lot as a group and we see a light at the end of the tunnel."

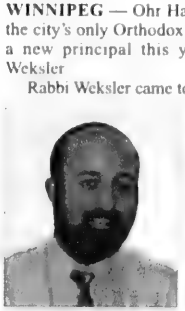
By REBECA KUROPATWA
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Ohr Hatorah Day School, the city's only Orthodox Jewish school, has a new principal this year, Rabbi David Weksler

Rabbi Weksler came to Winnipeg with his family in August 2005 as an educational shaliach (emissary).



Rabbi David Weksler

He says he says he has always wanted to do shlichoot.

"My whole family has done shlichoot," he said in an interview. "It is important to do. Chootz l'Aretz [outside of Israel] it is harder for Jews to keep up an Orthodox education."

Before leaving Israel, the rabbi was head of a yeshiva for boys in B'nai Brak. He has come to Canada with his wife, Michal, and their four daughters. His wife was expecting their son, Yedidiah, who was born here after their arrival

"The Jewish Community here in Winnipeg is, although small, very warm, receptive, welcoming and interested in enriching their Jewish life and education," Rabbi Weksler says. "It is very difficult to be a practising Orthodox Jew outside of Israel. Yet, the community here is undergoing an awakening of interest in strengthening the Jewish community's identity and involvement."

Ohr Hatorah Day School, which was originally called Torah Academy, started up in the late 1970s, Rabbi Weksler explains. "At its height, this school had approximately 150 students, with the highest grade being Grade 8.

"In the 1988-89 school year, Torah Academy was changed to Ohr Hatorah Day School. And, to all intents and purposes, it was a new school. It was the same building, but a new school – with a new rabbi, new teachers and everything. Today's Ohr Hatorah started up in 1998."

The school currently has 45 students in total, with about 15 in each of the nursery and kindergarten classes and five to seven in each of the Grade 1 to Grade 8 classes. "This is the first year that Ohr Hatorah has added the Grade 8 class," Rabbi Weksler says.

"What is nice about having a smaller school is that you can provide better teaching with smaller class sizes."

Describing Ohr Hatorah's curriculum, Rabbi Weksler says that "the school provides the kids with general studies that are on the same level as that stipulated by the Manitoba School Board. There are also improved Judaic studies. It is at a high level – similar to that in Israel."

A lot of changes were made this year, he says. "Everything is new: there is a new curriculum, and almost all new teachers."

One new concept he has instituted for the students is daily "communication and exploration using the computers, technology and the Internet. They connect with students in Israel every day, discussing all facets of Jewish studies.

"My hope," Rabbi Weksler says, "is to strengthen and stabilize the Jewish community's level of spirituality so that kids can feel very at home with their Jewish identity."

His philosophy of education is based on the principle "that there are three pillars or legs... required for effective Jewish learning, and one without the others is insufficient." He refers to them as kohtaret (headlines). The headlines are the study of "Torah, Eretz Yisrael, and Am Yisrael."

His goal is to instil in the students and community "an understanding of all aspects of Jewish life, a love for Torah, deep learning and a good understanding of the halachot [Jewish laws]."

The rabbi says he is very serious about "providing honest and concrete positive change – not to do things just for show. It should be lasting." He also hopes to "make a strong association with the Jewish community here and the one in Israel. There should be a strong connection. And, hopefully, they will want to come to Eretz Yisrael."

He sees a lot of positive signs, he says. "More parents are wanting to get involved, bringing in more kids and more overall involvement."

'Russia will play its role with all the others'

support in terms of the world agenda to keep afloat such issues as the fight against terrorism and all those things that accompany it in the Middle East and other regions of the world.

G.M.: From an economic standpoint, I don't believe there are any problems with Russia being in the chair of the G8. Last year, there was an important conference n Ottawa devoted to the future of world energy, with outstanding specialists. The consensus among participants was that in the years to come – because of the speedy rise of China and India and American gluttony in terms of oil and gas – they must do something about that. Russia is one of the main stable sources of energy, unlike some countries in the Middle East, for example, like Iran or some others, on whom everybody depends now.

The very fact that there was unanimous support in making energy security the main point of the G-8 summit is a manifestation that everybody understands the role of the Russian world economy. It's probably more crucial than the role of France at the moment, or Germany – no disrespect meant to all those fine countries. If suddenly there would be a drastic slowdown in our production of gas and oil, I don't know how many countries in Europe wouldn't feel that.

G.M.: That's our official position as chair of the G-8 and as part of the leadership quartet – Russia, the United States, European Union and the United Nations. So we took the leadership and drafted a statement that demanded that Hamas renounce violence and renounce terrorism and recognize Israel. It's our official position.

CJN: But at the same time, Russia is arguing that the international community must live up to financial commitments to aid the Palestinian Authority and has not labelled Hamas a terrorist organization.

G.M.: In Hamas, there are different wings – an armed wing and a political wing. The political wing was allowed by the U.S., by the European Union, by Israel and by everybody else to participate in democratic elections in Palestine. And they won. So, it's the fruits of the policy of the democratization of the Middle East, which is being promoted by the U.S. and other countries. In democracies, you don't always make the wisest choice. But once the choice is made, you can either denounce the people and turn them all into terrorists, or you deal with the problem.

CJN: Do you see Hamas' election as a vote against the corruption that existed?

G.M.: It's a usual phenomenon in the contemporary world that elections are more often a criticism of something than very strong support of the alternative. It's a happy exception when you have a brand new alternative that is so appealing that everybody votes for it. Usually, it's discontent with current policies. In this case, yes, I think they were saying "no" to corruption. Now the problem is: do we denounce the people who voted for something by freezing them out? By punishing the people? Or by influencing them further, to go beyond the rejection of something into something positive?

CJN: How do you see Russia's role in all this?

G.M.: Russia will play its role with all the others. We have an influential Muslim community of 20 million with ties to the Arab world, and we hope, through them, we can influence forces of moderation that support the peace plan formulated by the quartet and supported by Israel and Mr. (Mahmoud) Abbas. We will support Mr. Abbas.

He said he will work with whoever is in government and steadfastly promote the peace plan whose goal is the creation of a peaceful and independent Palestine living peacefully with Israel. Our game plan it to promote him and influence Palestinians through dialogue to renounce terrorism and to recognize Israel officially. Will it be a long and a tough road, an uphill struggle? By all means.

CJN: Do you think Hamas is capable of changing?

G.M.: We must retain law and order – whatever that means in Palestine – and try to influence them to the best of our abilities. With Mr. Abbas being the chief leader of the Palestinians and supporters of Fatah still being very influential, I think we can put the peace process back on track. But if we just renounce the results of the elections and treat every Palestinian like a terrorist, we're heading into a terrible period of renewed violence in the Middle East and everybody will suffer.

G.M.: Which is probably a good thing, because they probably felt cozier and more comfortable in radical opposition. They had no responsibility but to promote all this suicidal bombing and violent struggle.

CJN: Are concerns over Iran's nuclear capability well-founded?

G.M.: There's no hard evidence today. It's like Iraq. I have a distinct sense of déja vu, unfortunately. There are some question marks, which the International Atomic Energy Agency has to answer. We had a meeting of the five permanent members of the UN Security Council in London, and it was agreed we would await its report. If Iran is in violation of international obligations, we will send the case to the Security Council and discuss it.

But I'm against undue dramatization. I remember very vividly how we argued (with U.S. President George W. Bush) in 2002 when he came to St. Petersburg. We gave him our intelligence information, shared our estimates with him, told him there was no evidence of weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, that it was an empty pretext. We also showed him that Al Qaeda and others would take advantage of his invasion, which they actually did. I don't want this tragedy repeated in Iran. So it's a very simple case. If there are major violations, let the specialists determine it. We know the dangers of radicals prevailing in Iran and creating nuclear weapons on our border. Let's wait for the report that's coming in March. It's (less than) two months away, and I don't think in two months, Iran will become a nuclear state. Israel is a nuclear state. But because we have a different relationship with Israel President Putin said survival of the State of Israel is in the national interest of Russia – we ignore that fact.

G.M.: Exactly. But if working from certain legalistic assumptions that violations, that certain codes of conduct by a state, are sufficient reason for moving against it in force by the international community, there must be some rules. It's like traffic rules. "This guy is speeding, but I like the colour of his eyes, so I don't give him a ticket." It can't be done this way.

I have reason to believe that Israel will react resolutely (if Iran has the bomb), but my gut feeling is if it happens, it will cause a very drastic deterioration of the situation. People mistakenly believe that dramatizing the Iranian situation is safer than dramatizing the North Korean situation. I disagree. By dramatizing things, you only play into the hands of the radicals. Radicals, they thrive on drama.

CJN: Why did President Putin reportedly state that the breakup of the Soviet Union was a disaster?

G.M.: He didn't say it was a disaster. Disaster means he regrets the breakup. What he did say was that the majority of the Russian population, by international poll, is not very supportive of what Mr. (Boris) Yeltsin did. The social safety net was gone. In our case, the whole system collapsed. This poor authoritarian state – which of course was a bad thing – was taking care of education, child care. Everything was free.

What Mr. Putin said was that it was a great historic drama. One thing is irrefutable: he brought us freedom. But give a child total freedom, give him a gun and go on vacation. There are no deep roots for democracy in Russian society, which means there will be a painful period of transition. Crimes committed by the Soviet state are a tough legacy, and everything is under magnified glass. We have to discuss things the way they are, not put a spin on it. I think Mr. Putin is managing quite well.

CJN: How is the Jewish community of Russia doing?

G.M.: It's an entirely different situation than what we had during the Soviet Union when all religions were crushed. This revival of Judaism – there are many rich and important people saying, "We are Jews and we are proud of it" – it's a very good thing, but also, in an unprepared society, it creates certain backlashes.

We have marginal elements who violate cemeteries, churches. In the Soviet Union, it was unthinkable to read Mein Kampf. You would go to prison immediately. Now, because people expect us to be more democratic – and justly so – you can buy Mein Kampf, and only now is our parliament discussing a ban on certain books inciting anti-Semitism. That's why it was so important, in conjunction with the Holocaust Centre, to have events commemorating the 60th anniversary of D-Day.

G.M.: Much better and closer than ever before. During the Cold War, we oriented all our resources towards Arab countries. So it was quite revolutionary for Mr. Putin to say that the survival and well-being of the State of Israel are in the national interest of Russia.

Mosque vandalism denounced

MONTREAL — Jewish groups condemned the recent acts of vandalism at two mosques in Laval.

Police said rocks were thrown through the windows of the Islamic Cultural Centre and the Al-Hissane Islamic Centre, which are less than a kilometre apart, early in the morning of Feb. 8.

"As Jews, we understand the pain that these types of incidents cause and abhor such desecrations," said Canadian Jewish Congress regional president Jeffrey Boro. "Whenever such events take place, we must stand in solidarity with the victims."

B'nai Brith Canada also raised concern about the Feb. 10 stabbing of an imam at a metro station.

Legal counsel Steven Slimovitch said: "The desecration of religious institutions by vandals and the subsequent attack of a member on a visible religious minority on our public transit system merit a full and an in-depth investigation by the Montreal police."

The police have not concluded that the attack was racially motivated.

The incidents prompted an appeal for respect among different communities from Raymonde Folco, MP for Laval-Les Iles and chair of the Quebec Liberal caucus.

"I appeal to all of you to show the greatest sense of respect, restraint and responsibility to avoid anything that might offend the beliefs of others," she said.

Folco added, in an apparent reference to the furor over Danish editorial cartoons of the Muslim prophet Muhammad, that freedom of expression "must be exercised with caution.

"The right to freedom of expression cannot involve the right to offend the religious beliefs of others. A balance must be found between freedom of the press and respect for religious icons."

Withholding PA funds resolves legal quandary

By RAFAEL D. FRANKEL
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — In its decision earlier this week to withhold the further transfer of funds to the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority, the cabinet resolved a legal question that was pending since Hamas' electoral victory last month.

At that time, Israel was placed in a legal quandary that saw the government forced to decide between illegally funding a terrorist organization or breaching previous agreements signed with the Palestinian Liberation Organization, which mandated the monthly transfer of tax revenue Israel collects on behalf of the PA.

While the 1994 Paris Protocol established a customs union between Israel and the PA, it also arranged for the PA to be able to collect tax revenue as would any normal government. However, since the PA did not have the necessary infrastructure or expertise to collect its own taxes, the protocol established a "revenue clearance mechanism." Under that scheme, Israel collected all duties on behalf of the PA and was obliged to transfer the money to it the following month.

Aside from an extended period during the second intifadah, Israel has until now transferred that money to the PA according to the agreement.

While halting the transfer of funds is technically a breach of the accords, Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mark Regev said that by declaring their intentions to ignore some of the PA's signed agreements with Israel, it was Hamas that legally ended the arrangement.

"The transfer of money is a bilateral agreement," Regev said. "The incoming Hamas government said all these agreements are null and void. So they can't say that all the agreements are null and void, but this one point you have to keep unilaterally."

Regev pointed out that Israel is not confiscating the money, but rather holding it in escrow in an interest-bearing account until the day comes when Hamas meets the three conditions Israel has set out for negotiations, or a new party assumes power in the PLC.

The tax agreement between Israel and the PA includes all forms of duties.

Palestinian import and export tariffs are collected by Israel at the point of entry and exit for goods, while businesses employing Palestinian labourers pay their employee income taxes to the PA tax-revenue fund.

The decision for Israel to collect the PA tax revenue was made for a number of logistical reasons, chief among them that the PA did not feel it could trust its own tax collectors, said Eran Shayshon, an analyst for the Re'ut think-tank in Tel Aviv. Israel also wanted the PA to remain, in many respects, a non-government, and it thus retained many governmental duties relating to the Palestinians for itself, he said.

Though ending the transfer of funds to the PA was a big step, the cabinet decided to employ only a small part of the economic leverage Israel has over the Palestinians.

In addition to the tax arrangements, the Paris Protocols created a customs union between Israel and the PA that harmonizes the tax structure between the two, but more importantly, allows for goods to move from Israel to PA areas and vice versa without being taxed.

While withholding the tax revenue from the PA may make governing more difficult for Hamas in the short run, it is ultimately expected to be able to replace that revenue with funding from Arab countries. On the other hand, were Israel to dissolve the customs union and begin to levy taxes on everyday items Palestinians buy from Israel, as well as on the produce Palestinians sell to Israelis, the economic consequences for the Palestinians could be severe, said Jonathan Lipow, chief economist of Forum FIE, a financial consulting group in Ra'anana. However, such taxes would also adversely affect the Israeli economy, Lipow said, and thus any such move should be carefully considered.

ending Israel's transfer of funds to the PA, asking the international community to do the same, preventing the transfer of security-related equipment to the PA, restricting movement of Hamas members going from Gaza to the West Bank and tightening the security checks at the Gaza crossings.

Eiland said his problem was one of timing, not substance. Israel, he said, was making a mistake in implementing these decisions now, following Saturday's PLC swearing-in ceremony, and not waiting until the formation of a Hamas government before taking these steps.

The Quartet – the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations – has made clear that it would not alter its relations with the PA until a Hamas government was formed. Its "D-Day" for changing its ties with the PA, therefore, is different from Israel's, which made the PLC ceremony Saturday the date and event that marked the beginning of a new era.

Eiland argued that if Israel wanted the freedom of movement to take even harsher measures against a Hamas-led PA in the future, it would need international support and understanding now. He said this support and understanding could very well dwindle were Israel to take measures against the PA now, and not give Hamas time to either reject or accept the three conditions Israel and the international community set for Hamas. These three conditions are disarming and disavowing terrorism, recognizing Israel, and accepting all previous agreements with it.

Indeed, by moving D-Day up, Israel made an about-face policy switch, since immediately after the PLC elections on Jan. 25, the country's position as relayed to western diplomatic officials was that Jerusalem would take a wait-and-see attitude until after a Hamas government was formed.

However, after Olmert came under sharp criticism from both Likud leader Binyamin Netanyahu and Labor leader Amir Peretz for his decision last week to transfer tax and customs revenues for the month of January to the PA, Israel moved up its D-Day to the date when the PLC was sworn in, not when a Hamas government was formed.

Eiland warned the cabinet that by taking sanctions now Israel may be shooting itself in the foot and damaging long-term international support for Israel's position vis-a-vis Hamas. If this, in fact, turns out to be the case, then Sunday's decision could go down as an example of Olmert sacrificing a valuable strategic asset – an international consensus against Hamas – for short-term political gain.

European Jewish leaders share challenges they face at home

By DINAH A. SPRITZER
JTA

PRAGUE — Hans Vuijsje, general director of the Jewish Social Work Foundation in the Netherlands, is worried about the nursing home he runs.

"We don't have enough Jews, so we fill the home with non-Jews," he said. "It's a matter of money… So how do we keep the nursing home Jewish with a declining Jewish population?"

Vuijsje was sounding off to an audience of 34 other European Jewish leaders of communities and organizations who spent three days recently contemplating the obstacles they face, from the high cost of kosher food in eastern Europe to the record number of French Jews making aliyah.

The First Forum of Directors, put on by the European Council of Jewish Communities and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, was intended to improve participants' fundraising and management skills. The forum also provided a snapshot of difficulties faced by beleaguered executives who were thrilled to hear they were not alone.

Daniel Koverman, leader of the 1,000-member Malmo community in Sweden, noted a challenge many European Jewish leaders face. "More than 65 per cent of our members are over 65 and the younger ones are disappearing to Stockholm, Gotenberg or Israel. For every Jewish birth, we have 30 deaths per year," he said.

Koverman's lament resounded with Petr Papousek, who heads a community of only 150 in Olomouc, Czech Republic. "There are at least 10 young Jews in Olomouc that are not members of the community," he said.

Alex Sivan, executive director of Fedrom, the Romanian umbrella organization that includes about 10,000 Jews, offered some inspiration. "We opened computer classes because young people in Romania can't afford the computers. The average monthly is wage is $95 (US). Let me tell you, we have attracted lots of young people."

The intermarriage rate in Europe is on average 50 per cent to 70 per cent, and much higher in eastern Europe.

A divisive issue among European Jewry is how to accommodate, or exclude, mixed families.

Lina Filiba, executive vice-president of the Jewish Community of Istanbul, provoked a stir among forum attendees when she said that her community actively seeks to involve non-Jewish spouses in community life by offering "neutral programs that they can feel comfortable participating in."

In Helsinki, couples that include a non-Jewish mother can get their children into a Jewish school and the community as long as they sign a document that promises the children will convert at the same time as having a bar or bat mitzah. But in Italy, such conversions were banned a few years ago, leaving some families with Jewish and non-Jewish siblings.

Andrej Zozula, executive director of the Polish Union of Religious Communities, said in Poland "finding anyone who is not in a mixed marriage" is a problem.

Tomas Kraus, executive director of the Czech Federation of Jewish Communities, noted an increasing number of conflicts that were dividing European communities, some having to do with orthodoxy, some with the rise of Chabad. "We as institutions have to take a some kind of stance on this challenge," he said.

Kraus outlined challenges that were particularly resonant for Jews in eastern Europe, such as who would care for all their cemeteries and synagogues. "Do we invest in stones or in people?" he asked.

Romania's Sivan said that every year he gets "a bunch of people in their 70s walking into the community for the first time, quietly admitting that they are Jewish, so they can be buried in a Jewish cemetery."

CJC, AFN travel to Israel for mission

First Nations leaders from across Canada will learn how their Israeli counterparts preserve their historic languages and culture as part of the first joint Canadian Jewish Congress-Assembly of First Nations (AFN) visit to Israel.

The largest-ever mission to Israel by a North American First Nations group arrived in Israel late last week for a six-day educational mission co-chaired by CJC national president Ed Morgan and AFN national chief Phil Fontaine.

Israeli folk singer Damari mourned

By TALYA HALKIN
Jerusalem Post

TEL AVIV — Thousands turned out to pay respects to the late Israeli folk singer Shoshana Damari last week. "How do we depart from someone who was in our lives for so many years?" asked actress Gila Almagor at a funeral ceremony at the Cameri Theater in Tel Aviv.

"In a country without a king, we had a queen. We chose you and we crowned you, you were the queen of song."

"She was an extraordinary and wondrous woman," said singer and composer Hanan Yovel after her death.

Born in Damar, Yemen, Damari came to Israel as a two-year-old in 1925. As a child she began performing at weddings with her mother and in her early teens she starred in radio skits and theatrical performances.

In 1945, Natan Alterman composed the song Kalaniyot (Anemones) for Damari – it became her signature hit. Damari's first record was released in 1948. Over the following decades, her strong alto voice represented the voice of a land in the process of renewal, full of optimism and hope.

In the early years of the state, Damari – in addition to being renowned for her beauty – first brought the flavour of Middle Eastern music, complete with her guttural Yemenite pronunciation, to mainstream Israeli culture.

Together with Yaffa Yarkoni, Damari was also considered to be the quintessential singer for soldiers, for whom she performed in times of both war and peace during the 1960s and 70s.

In the mid-80s, Damari returned to the limelight singing a duet with Boaz Sharabi. She was awarded the Israel Prize in 1988 for her contribution to Israeli vocal music, and in the same year released the album and eponymous single Or (Light), which offered a theme of hope during the difficult period of the late 80s. Damari continued to appear occasionally on stage, most recently collaborating on several songs with the singer and composer Idan Reichel.

Yovel said that Damari's talent involved performing the hundreds of songs written for her by the country's greatest poets and songwriters, including Natan Alterman and Moshe Vilensky, so that they seemed to have been her own.

"Without writing music, she left a mark on Israeli music history – like Sinatra, with whom certain American hits are identified," Yovel said

"Israel's artists lost a good friend, a winner of the Israel Prize and the queen of Israeli song," said the chair of the Israeli Union of Performing Artists (IUPA), Yankale Mendel. "She was a mother for us all, giving us love and sharing her humour, and it is a great loss."

Mendel revealed that Damari was also a talented artist, and that he had recently been in contact with her about an exhibition of her works, a project he hopes will still go through in the future.

"Damari's early recordings [from the early years of the state and the pre-state period] are a piece of Israeli history," said Gilad Ben-Shach, a musical editor for Israel Radio.

"She was a real diva," Ben-Shach added. "She gave expression to what was taking place here, and was a symbol of the rebirth of Hebrew music."

Culture and Education Minister Meir Shitrit observed that "Shoshana Damari's death marks the end of a long period in the cultural history of Israel."

Omri Sharon sentenced

The son of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon was sentenced to nine months in prison for campaign funding violations in his father's 1999 race for the Likud party leadership. Tel Aviv Magistrate's Court sentenced Omri Sharon to another nine months of suspended imprisonment and fined him some $65,000. Because of the condition of the prime minister, who has been in a coma since a Jan. 4 stroke, the start of Omri Sharon's prison term was postponed by six months to Aug. 31. His attorney said Omri Sharon would appeal the sentence.

Germany 'stands with Israel'

Germany's foreign minister said his country would stand with Israel in dealing with Iran. "In Israel, they know from the remarks I've made during the last few days that I, indeed, we, stand shoulder to shoulder with Israel," Frank-Walter Steinmeier said in an interview. Steinmeier said Germany could not accept an Iran with nuclear weapons and said negotiations to push the Islamic republic back from the brink were at an impasse. He refused to rule out German involvement in any military action against Iran.

Conscript service cut

Israel is gradually reducing the duration of mandatory military service. Under a plan unveiled last week, male soldiers drafted last summer will spend 28 months in uniform, rather than three years. Further reductions will bring the final service term for men down to two years by 2010. Soldiers who need extra training time for specialized posts will receive professional salaries. More limited cuts are expected for female conscripts, who generally serve a maximum of 24 months.

Israel to honour cherry tomato's inventor

The Israeli inventor of the cherry tomato will receive a state prize. The 2006 Israel Prize for Agriculture Research will go to Nahum Keidar, who developed the bite-sized fruit now enjoyed worldwide, the Education Ministry announced this week. Keidar, a professor at the Weizmann Institute of Science, originally intended cherry tomatoes to be a snack.

640,000 trees planted

The Jewish National Fund marked Tu b'Shvat last week by planting hundreds of thousands of trees throughout Israel. The JNF said its volunteers, led by acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, planted 640,000 trees at public parks and nature reserves. All of the saplings were from indigenous species including carob, pistachio, oak, cyprus, pine, cedar, olive, fig, pomegranate and grapevines. Seventy per cent of the saplings were planted in the Negev Desert.

Hamas chooses PM

Hamas has chosen Ismail Haniyeh to be the next Palestinian Authority prime minister. Haniyeh is seen as a relative moderate within the terrorist group. He headed the group's list in parliamentary elections last month in which Hamas scored a surprise triumph.

Eye of the Storm: And now, for the 'Supreme Leader'

By AMIR TAHERI
Jerusalem Post

Commentary

While the world is focused on the clock of Iran's nuclear program, the other clock, that of the nation's domestic politics, is all but ignored by most commentators.

Both clocks have their alarms set. That of the nuclear clock is expected to ring within the next three to five years, unless something is done to interrupt the military aspects of the program. The alarm of the domestic politics clock, however, could be set off within the next few months as the power struggle in Tehran enters a new and more intense phase.

The event to watch is the forthcoming election of a new Assembly of Experts, a body of mullahs whose task is to elect the "Custodian-Theologian" – more commonly known as the "Supreme Guide," who has virtually unlimited powers under the Khomeinist constitution.

The election, to be completed in April, will not be open to all citizens. As always in the case of elections in the Islamic Republic all candidates must be approved by the authorities. And once the results are in, the Council of the Guardians of the Constitution, a body of 12 mullahs, can cancel part or all of them. In other words these elections resemble primaries held inside the same political party.

Ali Khamenei

The dominant group in the current Assembly of Experts consists of mullahs with business interests and old ties to the incumbent "Supreme Guide," Ali Khamenei and the former presidents Ali-Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani and Muhammad Khatami.

The interest of the coming election is whether or not there will be a change of majority in the assembly. Such a change would be the logical continuation of the presidential election which swept a new generation of radical revolutionaries to power under Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. And if change does happen, there is no guarantee that the new ruling elite would not want one of its own to become "Supreme Guide."

The common assumption in Tehran is that Khamenei, the current Supreme Guide, will be confirmed in his position at least for the time being. But, when it comes to Iranian politics, common assumptions often prove wrong. In last summer's presidential election, for example, many had expected Rafsanjani to sweep to victory. The more knowledgeable had speculated that Mohsen Qalibaf, a retired police chief and the favoured candidate of Khamenei, would win. As it turned out, Ahmadinejad won in a landslide.

During the presidential election, Khamenei was astute enough to adjust his tactics. Having backed Qalibaf in the first round he switched to Ahmadinejad in the second. Ahmadinejad, however, feels he owes nothing to Khamenei. By putting the focus on the "Hidden Imam" Mahdi as the sole source of power in the Islamic Republic, Ahmadinejad has tried to marginalize the "Supreme Guide." In many of his speeches he puts the Mahdi ahead of all prophets and claims that he has "a private personal channel" to the "Hidden Imam."

Theoretically, only the most learned of the Shi'ite clerics are supposed to be considered for the position of "Supreme Guide." In practice, however, not a single senior ayatollah is showing any interest in the job. In fact, the overwhelming majority of Shi'ite clerics in Iran now believe that their participation in government was a mistake, and that Khomeini had been more of an ambitious politician than a proper religious leader. Some senior mullahs want the post of the "Supreme Guide" abolished and its political responsibilities transferred to the president of the republic. The religious aspects of the post would then become the responsibility of a five-man council of theologians.

Both Rafsanjani and Khatami had supported that formula, albeit indirectly. And some analysts believe that, had Rafsanjani won, he would have pressed for the merger of the two top posts of the regime.

The new ruling elite, symbolized by Ahmadinejad, however, appears determined to maintain the post of "Supreme Guide" while divesting it of some of its political and administrative powers. In that context the new elite's ideological guru, Ayatollah Muhammad-Taqi Mesbah-Yazdi could emerge as the leading candidate for "Supreme Guide", if and when Khamenei is forced out.

Ayatollah Muhammad-Taqi Mesbah-Yazdi

The contrast between the two men could not be greater. While Khamenei was unable to complete his theological studies before the revolution because of frequent spells in the Shah's prisons, Mesbah-Yazdi steered clear of politics and received the most sophisticated education that the Shi'ite clergy could offer. Those who know him claim that he is one of the leading experts in Shi'ite philosophy. But they also insist that he is a hardliner on social and cultural issues and has a feeling of profound contempt for the modern civilization led by the Western democracies.

Because he didn't get a chance to train as a mullah, Khamenei became a politician. After the revolution he first worked as an aide at Khomeini's office in charge of distributing cash to needy mullahs throughout the country. He then became head of the office for military procurement and, later, Deputy Defence Minister under the Lebanese-Iranian militant Mostafa Chamran. In 1989, he caused a surprise when the Assembly of Experts declared him to be "Interim Supreme Guide," days after Khomeini's death. The next assembly turned his "interim" position into a permanent one.

Mesbah-Yazdi, however, has virtually no political experience and, if elected "Supreme Guide," might be content with providing Ahmadinejad with clerical cover only and allowing him to run the show.

Although Mesbah-Yazdi has shunned the limelight, he has been at the centre of most debates within the Khomeinist establishment for the past six or seven years, arousing often violent passions both for and against. The reason is that he is totally against both taqiyah (obfuscation) and kitman (dissimulation) which have been perfected into veritable arts by the mullahs over the centuries. Thus he often says aloud what most mullahs think in silence.

A disciple of the late Iranian philosopher Ahamd Fardid, Mesbah-Yazdi is full of contradictions. On the one hand he talks of "the direct link between believers and the Hidden Imam." On the other he claims that most believers lack the wisdom to distinguish right from wrong, and thus need to be led and looked after like children. He speaks of his dream of a universal Islamic state which would lead the way out of the "deadly maze of greed and corruption created by the West." And yet he insists that non-Shi'ite Muslims are "deviants" and, as such, cannot participate in the conquest of the world for "true Islam."

Whatever its outcome, the election could have a major impact on the course of Iranian politics over the next few years.

If the new radical elite do not win a majority, the old guard, led by Rafsanjani, could forge an alliance with Khamenei and oust the new guard, led by Mesbah-Yazdi and Ahmadinejad in the next parliamentary election in two years. If, on the other hand, the new guard captures control of the Assembly of Experts, it may well launch a major reform of the Islamic Republic's political structures with the aim of "full mobilization for the coming clash of civilizations," as foreseen by Ahmadinejad and Mesbah-Yazdi.

As for the nuclear clock neither the old nor the new guard wish to stop it. But it requires little imagination to see that a nuclear bomb in the hands of messianic luminaries like Ahmadinejad and Mesbah-Yazdi would be more frightening than in the hands of mullahs like Rafsanjani and Khatami with business interests and contacts in the West.

Hamas high on agenda as Rice heads to Mideast

By NATHAN GUTTMAN
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice embarked Monday on a five-day Middle East visit aimed at ensuring Arab countries don't provide financial aid to the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority and strengthening the international front against Hamas.

After an initial decision not to provide direct funds to the Hamas government and to review existing aid programs to the Palestinians, the United States is now moving forward with closing possible loopholes that would enable international money to get into Hamas' hands.

On Friday, the State Department announced the United States is demanding the PA return $50 million it received during the past year to fund infrastructure projects in Gaza following Israel's pullout. According to State Department spokesperson Sean McCormack, the PA agreed to give back the funds, which will undergo review by the United States.

In addition to blocking any U.S. funds from reaching the PA, the United States is also intensifying its efforts to ensure other countries don't fill the financial gap left by the United States.

Condoleezza Rice

The increased U.S. pressure to cut funding to the PA does not include funds for humanitarian aid projects, which the administration wants continued.

While in the past month the United States lobbied Arab countries to maintain assistance to the Mahmoud Abbas-led cabinet, it's now urging these countries to stop all non-humanitarian funding, since it will be used to support a Hamas government.

The United States is aware that stopping foreign aid might mean the PA can't pay public sector salaries, but it sees this as a needed step to pressure Hamas. "The Palestinian need for resources is a lot, by most estimates $1.9 billion (US) a year," Rice said Friday. "It will be interesting to see if that can be gotten from states that are not committed to the peace process."

Rice will stress in her meetings in Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates and Egypt that Arab countries should join the international community in stopping direct cash flow to the PA until Hamas recognizes Israel and stops terror.

"I would hope that any state that is considering funding Hamas, a Hamas-led government, would think about the implications of that for the Middle East," Rice said Friday to a some Arab journalists in Washington.

Rice will also underline in her conversations that once Hamas forms the PA cabinet, any passing of direct funds to the PA could be seen as breaking the U.S.-led global war against funding terror, which was designed originally to stop the funding of Al Qaeda.

The main problem facing the United States on this issue is Iran, which does not adhere to these global rules.

While the United States is now focussed on stopping the cash flow to the PA, it's also calling on countries to limit their ties with Hamas and to use these meetings only to stress the demands the organization has to accept before becoming a legitimate partner. The U.S. attempt to block all diplomatic ties with Hamas has failed, after Russia, Turkey and the Arab states invited Hamas leaders and held discussions with them.

On the issue of Iran's nuclear program, Rice used a meeting with Jewish leaders last week to make one of her toughest statements to date on the use of force. "No options are off the table, no one is ready for a nuclear Iran, the Iranians must understand that," she said, according to people attending the meeting at the State Department. "Accomplishing that goal is not in their interests. The United States and this president do not have a credibility issue when it comes to the use of force."

The reference, made at a private forum with eight Jewish organizational leaders, appeared to be to the U.S. decision in 2003 to invade Iraq, despite international opposition. Comparing Iraq to Iran is rare for administration officials, who are usually careful to say the cases are vastly different because Iran poses far more serious military challenges than Saddam Hussein's Iraq did.

30% of Gaza evacuees still homeless

By RAFAEL D. FRANKEL
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Six months after the Gaza disengagement, about 30 per cent of the approximately 8,000 people who were forcibly evicted from Gaza are still living in hotels and dozens are being housed in dorms and even tents, according to figures provided by the Committee of Gaza Settlements and by the Disengagement Authority.

But aside from those numbers, it is difficult to paint an overall picture of the evacuees' status, as the data issued by the two sides were widely divergent, with the settlements committee saying that the basic needs of thousands of people have not been met, while the government claimed to have offered reasonable solutions to nearly everyone.

The two sides were specifically at odds over their assessments of the two most substantive issues: the housing situation and the compensation packages that the government committed to provide the evacuees on their withdrawal from Gaza last summer.

There was some agreement on the progress toward finding permanent sites for the 21 Gaza communities to rebuild the towns they lost in August, but there was frustration from settlers in that they were not provided greater assistance in finding new jobs.

"The biggest problem is that [the government] didn't realize that we are not only 1,800 individual families, [but] communities that had established our own wonderful way of life," said Dror Vanunu, the international coordinator for the Gaza committee.

According to a report issued by the Gaza committee and information gathered by the Jerusalem Post from settler spokespersons, 1,027 families that were removed from Gaza now have at least a temporary home, 479 of which are in the caravan community in Nitzan. At least 408 families were not yet provided with temporary housing, the sources said. Of those, 63 families were living in tents and 90 were living in dormitories.

Meanwhile, 340 families found their own solutions and were already living in permanent houses, the committee said.

The Disengagement Authority painted a much different picture. Only 178 families were still without at least temporary homes, authority spokesperson Haim Altman said. The rest, who did have temporary housing, were located in caravans in Nitzan, Yad Binyamin and three different kibbutzim. In Mafki'im and Yad Hanna, families were already living on land they would use to build their future homes and towns, Altman said.

However, while some agreement existed regarding the housing situation, there was little if any common ground on the issue of the compensation packages that were promised to former Gaza settlers.

According to the Gaza committee, to date, around half of the evacuees received only NIS 50,000 (about $10,600 US) or a down payment on a house. Around 45 families (2.5 per cent) received all of the compensation money, which ranged from about $150,000 (US) to more than $300,000 (US), according to the formula developed by the government, and another 45 families received 75 per cent of their package. About 810 families (45 per cent) had not yet received any money at all from the government, the committee said.

"Everyone is responsible for this. The evacuation of Gush [Katif] was well planned – there were 20 months," Vanunu said. "It wasn't a tsunami or [Hurricane] Katrina. All the ministries, SELA [the Disengagement Authority], [and Prime Minister Ariel] Sharon himself" share blame for the situation.

The numbers were strongly disputed by Altman, who cited figures provided to him by the Prime Minister's Office that said 889 families (49 per cent) received the full compensation package, 235 (13 per cent) families received 75 per cent of the package and 445 families (25 per cent) received a down payment between NIS 50,000 and NIS 300,000. To date, Altman said, the government had dispersed more than NIS 1 billion in compensation money to the Gaza evacuees.

In response to Vanunu's charge that the government was not prepared for dealing with the evacuees, a Disengagement Authority official said the agency's hands were tied "because the vast majority of the evacuees began to talk to us only after the holidays, after the evacuation. The minute they began to talk, the processes of relocation and compensation accelerated.

"The name of the game was co-operation, and the minute the co-operation began, things began to move on better," the official added.

In regard to finding permanent homes and land for the Gaza evacuees to build communities, the sides were nearly on the same page.

According to Vanunu, three Gush Katif towns have reached agreements with the government on land that will be theirs in perpetuity. Most of the families of Ganei Tal will build homes in Hafetz Haim, Netzarim will move to Yevul in the Negev and Atzmona will relocate to Shomria in the Lachish area.

Vanunu added that many other former Gaza communities were nearing decisions and would likely have agreements with the government in place by Pesach.

Altman offered a slightly different version of the progress, saying that only the people formerly of Kfar Darom had not chosen a new site to build. He also said the communities now were modified versions of their former selves, with families from some communities mixing together to form different groups with which to build anew.

"They have changed, and we have gone with the [new] groups and we have created a variety of solutions according to their will," he said.

How long it would take to build the new communities remained a mystery, both sides said. "The building process could take 10 years or two years. It depends how much help we're given from the government and the Jewish Agency," Vanunu said.

According to an understanding with the government, the settlers are responsible for building their own homes in the new communities, while the state would build the infrastructure. When asked how much money the government would allocate to developing the new towns, and when it would place it in the budget, Altman said the Housing Ministry was responsible and not the Disengagement Authority.

As of press time, no one at the Housing Ministry was available for comment.

Unemployment remains rampant for Gaza evacuees, with around 1,600 people out of the 2,100 who lost their jobs as a result of the disengagement still without work, according to Gaza committee member Alon Hoisman. Many were farmers who had not yet found new land on which to begin growing crops again. That problem is particularly acute now, as the unemployment benefits many of the people are receiving are due to run out in the coming days.

According to Hoisman, most of the 500 who had found work did so in the last two months. The vast majority found work by themselves or with the help of a volunteer program and the website for the former Gaza residents, www.4katif.org.il, as opposed to assistance from the government, Hoisman said.

According to Altman, finding work for the Gaza settlers was also not the Disengagement Authority's responsibility. That lay with the Labor Ministry, he said, which was also unavailable for comment at press time.

Despite the many problems settlers have faced in the last half year, the feeling is that the government had become more helpful recently, Vanunu said.

"We feel that things are moving a little bit better, but we are still far, far, far away from solving the problem," Vanunu said.

Holocaust story makes theatre debut

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Fully aware that presenting the horrors of the Holocaust through literature, film and theatre has been tackled many times before, Emil Sher felt Hana's Suitcase was different and became determined to bring it to the stage.

After discovering a children's story about a group of Japanese students who were captivated by the story of a little girl who perished in the Holocaust, Sher, a prolific playwright, began transforming parts of the book into scenes of a play in his head.

"So many images rose to the surface," he said, adding that as a father of two young children, he is always looking for good stories to share with them.

Hana's Suitcase, originally a CBC radio documentary produced by Karen Levine, who later turned it into an award-winning and bestselling children's book in 2002, is a true story about a young Holocaust victim, Hana Brady, and the connection that was made with a group of Japanese students more than five decades later.

Levine produced the documentary after she read an article about a Japanese woman named Fumiko Ishioka, the director of the Tokyo Holocaust Education Resource Centre, who taught Japanese youth about the Holocaust.

Ishioka visited the Auschwitz-Birkenau State Museum in Poland in 1999 and asked the museum to lend her artifacts that once belonged to children who died during the Holocaust.

She did this in the hope that having something tangible would help the members of Small Wings – a group of elementary and high school students who met regularly at the Holocaust centre in Tokyo – relate to the tragedy and the children who perished.

When a beaten, brown leather suitcase, bearing nothing but a name and a birth date, arrived at the centre, the Small Wings group was determined to find out everything they could about the girl who once owned it.

After months of research, Ishioka discovered that Hana's brother, George Brady, the only surviving member of her immediate family, was living in Toronto.

Through letters from Hana's brother, Ishioka and her students learned what Hana was like as a child and about her dream to become a teacher, before she was gassed to death in Auschwitz in 1944.

"In many plays about the Holocaust, we expect to hear a story about someone who is Jewish," Sher said.

"What makes this story so compelling is that a Japanese woman and children are so keen on finding out about Hana. This is a culture that is very removed from Judaism, but their determination and passion to exhume the story is very powerful."

Once Sher got permission from Levine to recreate the story on stage, he wrote the play with Nancy Guertin and Stephen Colella.

Allen MacInnis, the artistic director at the Lorraine Kimsa Theatre for Young People, helped turn Sher's visions into powerful scenes.

"There is a certain vocabulary to theatre and it is important to play to a genre's strengths. One of the things we're able to do effectively on stage, that is much harder to do on film and in television, is have two time frames unfolding simultaneously," Sher said.

He noted that he was able to present two settings, modern-day Tokyo and Czechoslovakia in the '30s and '40s, in one scene.

The play is divided into two acts. The first act is meant to teach the audience about who Hana was as Akira and Maiko, two members of Small Wings, learn more about her, Sher said, and the second act shows how her life unfolded before she was gassed at the age of 13.

Sher described another technique he used in an attempt to connect the audience with the story.

He incorporated what he called "Holocaust figures," who wear masks so that they could be faceless. He purposely wanted the figures to have no identity so that people could relate to them and think, "That could have been me."

He said that trying to keep this play appropriate for children weighed heavily on the minds of everyone involved.

"We didn't want to sugar-coat it, but we also didn't want to make the play too dark or despairing," Sher said.

"Parents will probably have a harder time with this because they will be bringing a different perspective."

He hopes that different reactions to the play may help create a dialogue between younger and older generations.

"I hope the play will cause the audience to reflect and that somehow the play will resonate with them. Reflection is the best we can hope for."

The stage première of Hana's Suitcase takes place at the Lorraine Kimsa Theatre for Young People on March 4 and the show runs until April 23. Tickets are $20 for adults and $15 for kids. For more information, visit www.lktyp.ca.

The Tenth Man combines Kabbalah with 'good old Yiddishkeit'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Shira Schwartz as the possessed Evelyn, Mark Albert as Arthur and Arnie Zweig as The Cabalist in Teatron's upcoming production of The Tenth Man.

Teatron Theatre's production of Paddy Chayefsky's The Tenth Man, on stage at Leah Posluns Theatre from March 8 to 12, is a classic with some slight updates, says director Ari Weisberg.

"We didn't touch the story – it's timeless. It's a lovely, warm play about a group of ordinary Jewish people. We can all relate to them. It deals with real people and real dilemmas, but it has a twist of the supernatural," Weisberg said.

"We all know the people in the play. They are the older generation who came to this side of the world from traditional homes, got swept away by modern life in America and now, after retirement, seek security in the familiarity of the tradition they left behind.

"They have plenty of time on their hands and will go to visit each other's cemetery plots just to 'kill a day.' They jokingly contradict each other on practically anything, but their love for each other is the tightest of bonds," said Weisberg, Teatron founder and artistic director.

The play opens in an inner-city synagogue, when the group of friends meet for their regular minyan. One member of the group is an atheist who comes to keep warm, and another is brought in from the street to make up the quorum.

Things change, Weisberg said, when one of the men brings his granddaughter, who he believes is possessed by a dybbuk.

"While the men try to arrange for an exorcism, their own true beliefs, life stories and problems come to the forefront, culminating in a surprising ending," said Weisberg.

"[It's] a warm and timely look at the past and the future, combining an encounter with the mysteries of Kabbalah as well as the solid humour of plain, good old Yiddishkeit."

> 'With 13 actors, it's the biggest cast we've ever had'

When the play originally ran on Broadway in the 1950s, Weisberg said, everything then was in English.

"They used 'prayer shawl' instead of 'tallit,' and 'phylacteries' instead of 'tfillin.' With permission from the publishers, we also added some Hebrew here and there to make it more geared to our audience.

"Chayefsky was reaching a different audience then. Even today, there are Yiddish words used on Broadway. In those days, however, people were not familiar with the terms."

The cast, which has been in rehearsal since Jan. 16, is a large one, Weisberg said. "With 13 actors, it's the biggest cast we've ever had. In this day and age, unless it's a musical, there is typically four or five people in a cast.

"This was a big undertaking. There is an elaborate set, and even though it's not a musical, there is some song and dance."

A lot of people know the play, and "a lot of people know Chayefsky. He was a prolific writer and a concerned Jew."

A preview of The Tenth Man will be staged March 8 at 1 p.m., and opening night is March 8 at 8 p.m. There is also a performance March 11 at 8:30 p.m., and performances March 12 at 2 p.m. and 8 p.m.

Tickets for the preview are $15; for the mid-week and matinee performance, $26, and for Saturday night, $30. Seniors/students discounts available. For tickets, call 416-855-6651.

Television's Rhoda is Golda in play

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

If you look up Zionist in the dictionary, you should find the names Theodor Herzl, David Ben-Gurion, Golda Meir and Valerie Harper.

Yes, Valerie Harper, the non-Jewish actress who starred as that beloved New York Jew Rhoda Morgenstern on the TV series The Mary Tyler Moore Show and later on her own series Rhoda.

The Los Angeles-based Harper, whose mother hails from Lloydminster, Alta., seems to have made a career of portraying Jewish women, as in her riveting performance as Holocaust survivor Hannah Epstein in the 1985 TV movie The Execution.

The 65-year-old Harper's passion for Israel and the Jewish people is evident when she speaks about her latest project, Golda's Balcony, written by playwright William Gibson and coming to Toronto's Elgin Theatre from May 23 to 28.

Golda's Balcony was the longest-running one-woman play in Broadway history. It starred Tovah Feldshuh, who took it on tour to Los Angeles, where Harper first saw it.

"I was thrilled that William Gibson wrote it – he wrote what I think is the perfect American work, The Miracle Worker and it was about one of my heroes, Golda Meir. I saw the play with Tovah, who is a great actress, in February. Then a call comes at the end of March asking if I would be willing to go out on tour, because Tovah wanted to be with her child during graduation year [from high school].

"We started rehearsing in September, I knew we would have four weeks rehearsal, which would not be enough, so I started becoming familiar with the text right away," Harper says.

The main action of the play centres around the 1973 Yom Kippur War, when Egypt and Syria jointly attacked Israel. Meir was 75 and Israel's prime minister at the time.

As the play unfolds, the character of Golda talks about where she came from – she was born in Kiev, raised in Milwaukee, Wisc., and left for Palestine at 23 – and examines events in her life that were cataclysmic, uplifting, funny and sad.

Golda runs 85 minutes without an intermission, and Harper plays 44 different characters, including Meir from childhood to death's door at 78.

The production has been making audiences both laugh and cry.

"It's a beautiful play, in that it examines that good exists, but there is evil right by it. Your good might create evil for somebody else. In saving your world, how many worlds are you entitled to destroy?" Harper asks.

Harper notes that during the Yom Kipper War, Meir had to contemplate how far to she would have to go to protect Israel, including the possible use of nuclear weapons.

"The rescue of Jews – that is Zionism at its heart. But suddenly Golda is in the munitions business. She was in a war-like stance to defend yourself from people who want you dead – like Hamas now. They have the destruction of Israel in their charter.

"This play was written awhile back, but it is still pertinent," she adds.

She is emphatic that Israel "is the Jewish homeland. Period. No matter what people say to the contrary."

Her admiration for the tenacity of Israel and the Jewish People is evident.

"You can't play at the table of nations without terra firma, and Jews, in effect, have kept a nation together without land. How in the world did they do it? It is a commitment to the culture, remembering, 'Next year in Jerusalem.'"

The play also takes the audience through Meir's U.S. fundraising tour of 1948, when she raised $50 million (US) for the new state – twice the amount that was needed.

Using Golda's words and midwestern accent, Harper recites one of her favourite passages from the play, "We are going to fight. We are not stepping into boxcars ever again. If everyone dies, we will fight with stones. If we have arms to fight with, we will use them. We intend to live, our neighbours intend us to die. There is not much room for compromise... There's no question that can't be settled if you grant us one right – to exist here."

For Harper, one thrilling moment on the current tour came in Cleveland when 50 Holocaust survivors came backstage after the show.

Looking in their faces was overwhelming, she says.

One old man with big blue eyes took her hand and said, "Bless you Ms. Harper and bless Mr. Gibson."

At that, Harper says, she began to cry, and with emotion in her voice, she remembers that she said to the man, "No, bless you."

On a lighter note, she says that "little old Jewish ladies grab my cheek and say, 'Sweetheart tell me the truth. I read you aren't Jewish, but aren't you?'

"And I say, 'In my heart I am, and if you go back far enough, we all are.'"

There are plans to take Golda's Balcony to London and Israel after the play ends its North American tour in June.

Once the whole tour is complete, Harper and her husband, actor and producer Tony Cacciotti, will be developing health-related television specials. The couple have a daughter, Cristina, 21, who is also an actress.

Gilbert and Sullivan transplanted to the Wild West

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Take the famed Gilbert and Sullivan operetta The Mikado, transplant it to the American Wild West, adapt some names, accents and music and what do you get?

"Taking a classic and putting it in a modern setting is just a way of enhancing it," says Ricciardelli.

"Even if you've seen the traditional version many times, this version will be something you'd never expect. I think if we can make lovers of the original enjoy a new experience and create new fans, then we've done more than our job as performers."

The production, put on by the North Toronto Players, commemorates the community theatre group's 40th anniversary.

The cast is a mix of professionals and amateurs, as well as a permanent group of chorus members.

"I find this group particularly good," says Ricciardelli, who's been the music director of North Toronto Players for more than a decade.

"They're very enthusiastic and dedicated."

Characters from the original Mikado, such as Nanki-Poo and Kati-sha, are respectively singing cowboy Lanky Lou and Kitty Shaw in the Players' adaptation.

What's more, the singers have altered their accents to showcase a southern twang and Ricciardelli rewrote some of the orchestral pieces, incorporating Hollywood western sounds and the theme song from the hit TV show Bonanza.

"We get really creative with our staging and interpretations," says the show's director Michael Harms.

"But we really do try to do the story moment by moment, so it's not just silly. And it's a much more kinetic production than what people are probably used to seeing from community theatre."

When North Toronto Players started 40 years ago, they were a tiny group working out of a church basement.

Today, they boast 50 dedicated members.

"I treat everybody as though they are professionals," says Harms, who has done professional work for 20 years.

"I'm always pushing them to the best of their abilities."

Harms is enthusiastic about The Mikado's dark humour, which he says makes the production entirely relevant to modern audiences, even though it was first produced in 1885.

"With The Mikado, there is so much dark humour," he relates.

"For instance, there's this whole sequence all about the difficulties of cutting one's own head off. That's something you could see on Mad TV or Saturday Night Live, so it doesn't really take any updating."

There is also Gilbert's timeless cynicism toward true love.

"Gilbert's take on relationships is quite cynical," Harms says.

"He doesn't really believe in love forever, and his heroines and heroes tend to be a bit smarter than that which is usual for an operetta."

Six performances of The Mikado will be presented at the Leah Posluns Theatre beginning Feb.24.

For tickets, call 905-727-2209 or visit www.northtorontoplayers.com.

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

According to Canadian immigration, Don Glaser is a world-class artist. When the California-born real-estate lawyer moved to Toronto three years ago, proving he was famous was the easiest way to get his family into the country.

"The immigration people loved my CD," says Glaser, a fast-fingered pianist. "I used to play in Paris and play at the top jazz clubs. We got reviews in Paris and a really nice one from Milan and that's what I showed the immigration woman."

A close look at Glaser's resumé will reveal that he is, in fact, a world-class musician. He's played in bands with Nat King Cole's drummer and Miles Davis' bass player, and cut a few 45s with jazz pianist Bobby Troup.

But he steadfastly maintains playing jazz isn't his day job. "How could it be?" he retorts.

"I was an academic student in high school, a top student," the Stanford graduate says matter-of-factly. "I had a chance to sign with Ella Fitzerald's agent. He said, 'I'd sign you now, but you'd have to quit school.' I was in college and opted not to sign."

To anyone else, passing up this once-in-a-lifetime opportunity seems ludicrous, but Glaser doesn't see what the fuss is all about. "I just wanted to have fun with it," he says.

Academics wasn't the only reason Glaser avoided a music career. His father, a part-time, but prolific violinist, discouraged a young Glaser from entering the music business.

"My father would say, 'You can't make a living at music and it's a tough life. Enjoy it, but don't do it as a profession.' I later heard from my friends that my parents were really worried that I was going to pursue music."

For someone who plays music part-time, though, Glaser managed to make a name for himself – he even came close to winning a Grammy. In 1981, the pianist and sometimes drummer teamed up with Jimmy Haskell, an arranger for Bette Midler, Simon and Garfunkel and a host of other big-name musicians, and released his first self-titled record. The disc did well – the single Strawberry Jam had moderate success on the radio – but it was his close encounter with music's most-coveted prize that really put Glaser's name on the map.

"We almost made it to the finals of the Grammy's," says Glaser. "We made it to the final 15."

Even though he wasn't nominated for the award, he was offered a plum contract with Concord Records, a new label that would eventually become the preeminent jazz label in North America. Unfortunately, Glaser turned down the offer and signed with Haskell, a decision Glaser still regrets to this day.

"Jimmy Haskell was a great arranger, but he started a record company, and when we completed the record he was interested in putting it out. He didn't have enough money, though, and [his label] went bankrupt. And once a record's out, it's out."

At least Glaser was left with a well-produced and well-received product. The Californian still has fond memories from those days, partly because his wife, Carol – a musician and clinical psychologist – gave birth to their first child soon after the record's release.

Since then, the Glasers have had three more kids – the youngest is 15 – and put out a second record in 1991 with Carol taking vocal duties on a few songs.

This musical union met almost 27 years ago, after Glaser's secretary, who was also Carol's friend, suggested she meet her boss.

"I've got this nice Jewish boss for you who's a lawyer," says Carol, recalling her friend's sales pitch. "I don't like lawyers, I said. They're too pedantic, and heck I'm going to be a doctor, so I don't need a lawyer."

When her friend mentioned this lawyer played jazz, Carol was sold. "I thought to myself, he's Jewish, he's a lawyer and he's playing jazz. Ha. So I went to hear him play the following week."

But Don and Carol's first meeting was almost foiled by a case of mistaken identity.

"I thought Carol was a reporter, writing a review of the show," says Glaser. "But it turned out she was just writing her dissertation."

The couple eventually married and lived in San Diego for 13 years, where Don argued cases in front of the state's supreme court, and opened a synagogue. Ten years ago, the Glasers moved to Teaneck, N.J., and in 2002, moved again, to Toronto.

"Toronto's a lot like San Diego, but without the weather," says Glaser, who occasionally plays around the city.

"People are kinder, sweeter, they say 'thank you' and 'please' and they're helpful and kind," says Carol.

Catch Don Glaser on Feb. 25, at the University of Toronto's Wolfond Centre at 8 p.m. The evening of music and food supports Or Chaim and Ulpanat Orot high schools. $45, $84/couple. To reserve, call 416-630-6772, ext. 34.

Don Glaser never gave up his day job, despite being a top jazz player.

PARADISE NOW – BOX OFFICE BOMB?

There's "nothing unusual about cinema portraying the psychodrama of real-life events torn from headlines," Toronto Star writer Rosie DiManno observed in a January review, noting that many films (such as In Cold Blood, Monster and Silence of the Lambs) traffic "in murder vérité and the particular pathology of killers without conscience."

DiManno was in the process of trashing Karla, Hollywood's obnoxious telling of the Bernardo-Homolka sex killings, but her comments might equally apply to another recent controversial film, the Palestinian-made Paradise Now, which glorifies wannabe and actual mass murderers who act from political motivations.

Paradise Now focuses on two Palestinian friends from Nablus who volunteer to bomb Israeli civilians in Tel Aviv, and chronicles the progress of these pilgrims on the twisted path to martyrdom. Premised on the notion that "suicide bomber" is a viable career choice, the film humanizes suicide bombers.

It's noteworthy that Britain banned Paradise Now from being shown at a festival last July shortly after the terror attacks on London's transit system. However, the film's reputation has been buoyed by a Golden Globe award and an Oscar nomination as best foreign film.

Given Hollywood's strong leftist sympathies, the film may yet come away with a coveted golden statue in a day and age when Hamas is victorious in the voting booth and western democracies bend over backward to appease bloodthirsty Arab mobs enraged at seeming trifles.

The troubling film posits "that suicide murder is legitimate when you feel you have exhausted all other means," writes Yossi Zur in an Internet letter. An Israeli, Zur is not a film critic; rather, his authority springs from his tragic loss of his teenaged son to a suicide bomber. He calls Paradise Now "extremely dangerous" because it also justifies the case of an Islamist murderer killing 100,000 people with a suitcase nuke or biological bomb. "Where does one draw the line?" he asks, pondering whether Americans would also embrace a film that humanizes the perpetrators of 9/11.

"Granting an award to this kind of movie gives the filmmakers a seal of approval to hide behind."

The Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences is reportedly considering revising its description of the film to reflect that it came not from "Palestine" but from the territory of the Palestinian Authority. That correction is certainly welcome, but let's hope academy members refrain from bestowing an Oscar on this objectionable film.

Kafka Returns: Theatre Little-Threshold Theatre and the Nadal JCC present Kafka and Son, a solo show by Alon Nashman, adapted from Franz Kafka's Letter to his Father. Nashman portrays both Kafkas, father and son, in this "blistering, often hilarious dissection of domestic authority." The legendary Jewish writer is depicted at age 35, still living at home, a petty bureaucrat, timid son and failed artist, under the thumb of a boorish and overbearing father. A Writer's Long and Dangerous War

A Writer at War: Vasily Grossman with the Red Army 1941-1945*, edited and translated by Antony Beevor and Luba Vinogradova, Knopf Canada.

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

Until recently, Isaac Babel has held the singular fame of being a Jew riding with the Red Army, at times incognito, while creating great literature. In his 1920 Diary, Babel straddles the unlikely irony of depicting his Cossack comrades while watching them destroy Jewish villages along the Polish-Russian border. Out of these experiences came the remarkable young man's collection of stories, Red Cavalry, which appeared to great acclaim in Russia in 1926.

There is a tradition of young writers – usually men – establishing themselves as war correspondents, or simply as veterans of the front, while gestating the material they will later use in fiction. Ernest Hemingway's World War I experiences influenced later fictional portrayals of a "lost generation," just as Norman Mailer rose to fame with a young man's novel of war, The Naked and the Dead.

The eastern front during World War II was the scene of instruction for Vasily Grossman, who travelled as a war correspondent with the Red Army, covering such tumultuous events as the battle of Stalingrad, the liberation of Treblinka in the summer of 1944, and the Russian occupation of Berlin in the spring of 1945.

Grossman published his first novel, Gliukauf! (Good Luck!) in 1934, but his best known work, including his masterpiece Life and Fate, drew on his experiences as a correspondent, beginning in 1941, for the Red Army newspaper Krasnaya Zvezda (Red Star).

Like Babel, Grossman faced the paradoxical challenge of writing honestly, within the censor's limits, about Soviet military and political goals. At the same time, his Jewish background ensured that with his success and heroism as a war writer, came the danger of incurring Stalin's mistrust.

Grossman was born in 1905 in Berdichev in the Ukraine. As a young man, he spent time in Moscow, followed by a stint as a mine engineer in eastern Ukraine. The middle to late 1930s were a time of danger for writers in the Soviet Union, and in 1937, Grossman joined the politically sanctioned Writers' Union. Still, he never became a party member.

In the introduction to A Writer at War: Vasily Grossman with the Red Army 1941-1945, the editors offer a telling description of the ways that luck and good timing saved Grossman from becoming a victim of Stalin's unrelenting purges of Jewish literary figures.

A Writer at War is an impressive compendium of Grossman's correspondent's reports, writing found in his notebooks, along with subtle and detailed editorial introductions, which contextualize his writing. The thoroughness of the presentation and the editors' access to Grossman's papers reflect the turn in east-west relations. The editors gained full access to Grossman's files in the Russian State Archive for Social-Political History, as well as those in the Central Archive of the Ministry of Defence. In addition, Grossman's surviving daughter acted as a resource in the book's creation.

Like Babel's 1920 Diary, Grossman's wartime writing is a startling mix of graphic violence and widespread destruction alongside lyrical vignettes, which convey the individual experience in the face of war.

Some of what Grossman noted – with regard to the pomposity of Red Army generals, the completeness of early defeats, and even the portrayal of dead Russians in the aftermath of battle – would never be published in Krasnaya Zvezda. One of the enduring relationships traced in A Writer at War is that of Grossman and his editor, Gen. David Ortenberg.

Ortenberg had the power to send Grossman into the heart of battle or to withdraw him on a whim, and he was far less naive in his appreciation of what a Jewish reporter, however famous, should be allowed to write about the nation's early defeats and the growing awareness of German atrocities against Jews.

Everything included in A Writer at War, from Grossman's first accounts of his departure for the front to his depictions of Berlin in flames, makes for powerful reading. As he travels toward the front in August 1941, he writes: "We spend a night at the railway station. Every corner is filled with Red Army soldiers. Many of them are badly dressed, in rags. They have already been 'there.' Abkhazians look the worst. Many of them are barefoot."

Grossman maintains the same eye for detail and sympathy through to the end of his travels into Germany. Among his reports in early May 1945, is the following: "The day of Berlin's capitulation. It's difficult to describe it. A monstrous concentration of impressions. Fire and fires, smoke, smoke, smoke. Enormous crowds of [German] prisoners. Their faces are full of drama. In many faces there's sadness, not only personal suffering, but also the suffering of a citizen. This overcast, cold and rainy day is undoubtedly the day of Germany's ruin. In smoke, among the ruins, in flames, amid hundreds of corpses in the streets."

Among the most startling sections in A Writer at War is the piece titled Treblinka July 1944. Grossman interviewed survivors of the camp immediately after its liberation by the Red Army, and he conveys in spare, cinematic prose the grotesquely elaborate process of mass murder enacted there: "In order to achieve the final deception for people arriving from Europe, the railroad dead-end siding was made to look like a passenger station. On the platform at which another 20 carriages would be unloaded stood a station building with a ticket office, baggage room and a restaurant hall. There were arrows everywhere, indicating 'To Bialystok,' 'To Baranovichi,' 'To Volokovysk.'"

Equally startling is Grossman's report of the German annihilation of the Ukrainian Jews, both in the countryside and in major centres like Kiev. His coverage in the aftermath of the destruction of Jewish Berdichev is heightened by his own feelings of guilt, connected with the belief that he had not done enough to help his mother escape disaster.

In the postwar years Grossman's career was undermined by his efforts, as part of the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee, to complete and publish a volume called The Black Book, which would detail German atrocities against Jews. This effort ran counter to the Stalinist position on suffering – "Do not divide the dead" – as well as to an official effort to downplay Ukrainian collaboration with the Nazis.

Life and Fate, Grossman's great novel of the siege of Stalingrad, was suppressed until his death in 1964. A copy of the manuscript was spirited out of Russia on microfilm by Andrei Sakharov. It appeared in print in Russia only after the collapse of communism.

Norman Ravvin is chair of Concordia University's Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies. His books include the novel, Lola by Night, and the story collection, Sex, Skyscrapers and Standard Yiddish.

New book lowers the volume on parenting

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

Just the cover of her new book is a useful parenting tool, jokes Sarah Chana Radcliffe. "Just look at the title," she told close to 150 listeners at a recent book launch at the Village Shul sponsored by the Jewish Family Institute.

In bold letters, the title Raise Your Kids Without Raising Your Voice (HarperCollins), indeed sends a clear message. And with 260 practical pages between its covers, there's lots of help inside for those looking to change their family's lives.

Sarah Chana Radcliffe

Though Toronto psychologist Radcliffe isn't a new author – her five books on Jewish family life, from Targum Press, have been translated into four languages – this is her first from mainstream publisher HarperCollins.

A mother of six, Radcliffe brings more than just academic experience to this very personal book. "I studied parenting before I became a parent," she says, "but the 'feelings' side came from my own experience." Raise Your Kids focuses not just on parenting strategies but on parents' emotions, and what Radcliffe calls "the real parenting journey as we live it."

"Most parenting books tell you what you do," Radcliffe says. "You could read a thousand and still be yelling at your kids." She explains, "That's because of our own human pain in parenting. If we can get a handle on that, we can do a lot better with this job."

Unlike many parenting books, while Radcliffe honours children's feelings, she emphasizes respect for parents. "In the past 30 years, [experts have] taught parents how to give a lot of sensitivity to their children." What we've ended up with, she says, are "sensitive parents and abusive children."

Fern Reich, whose children are now in their late teens, told listeners at the launch event that it is. Ten years ago, a self-identified parenting book "junkie," Reich couldn't implement much of what she'd learned until she found Radcliffe's classes. At her first, "I got it – by the third class, I knew I'd hit gold," she says.

Through concrete examples, Raise Your Kids presents tools aimed not merely at lowering the volume, but at building respectful relationships. Indeed, many of Radcliffe's strategies can be used not just with children, but between spouses and even in the workplace.

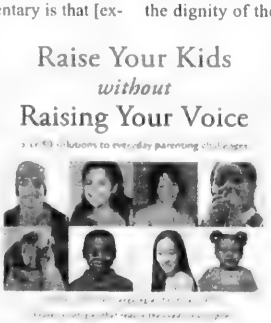
The CLeaR method, for example, is a three-step system using Comments, Labels and Rewards to set kids up for success. Instead of shouting or nagging, parents must look for opportunities to identify and praise positive behaviour.

Reich provided an example: Johnny, whose room is very messy, actually makes his bed. The parent first comments: "Johnny, you made your bed!" Then, the parent labels the effort: "You're very tidy." Finally, a small reward is given: "Why don't we read an extra story tonight?"

Radcliffe clarifies the difference between rewards and bribes – effective rewards can help build relationships, while bribes simply give children excessive control. A child who receives a reward will feel proud of his accomplishments. A bribed child may simply feel abandoned; "I'm only three and calling all the shots... Is anybody home?"

Many of Radcliffe's principles are derived from Judaism, like a "Torah prohibition against hurting people's feelings with words... the Torah goes out of its way to avoid negative words." Similarly, "never tell a child he's obnoxious, lazy, selfish, mean."

"The [rabbinic] commentary is that [expressing] anger causes us to lose our minds/souls temporarily. If our kid has ticked us off and we open our mouth and say destructive things, we lose it – our essential human nature." While her grounding in Torah is essential, she emphasizes that the book is also rooted in psychological principles.



SARAH CHANA RADCLIFFE

Simply for parenting tools such as the CLeaR method and the 2X rule – only ask kids twice; most parents, Reich says, use something like a "10X rule," getting louder and louder each time – the book is a valuable guide. But Radcliffe adds many insights from clients, students and her own children who, she jokes in the book's acknowledgments "provided all the examples of misbehaviour."

Although many parenting books address a specific period – infants, toddlers, teens – Radcliffe says "these few simple things will get you through 20 years and beyond," while "maintaining the dignity of the parent, the dignity of the child, the warmth of the relationship, the priority of the relationship."

Not all parents will agree with all her advice she recommends several alternative therapies, like aromatherapy, acupressure and other naturopathic interventions for emotional healing. Yet few could argue with her 30 years' experience. And throughout the book, she's quick to point out that while certain situations can be "self-helped," for others, parents should seek professional assistance.

With just a few basic ideas, Radcliffe says, we can make our home an oasis in a stressful world. "We underestimate the damage that parental anger can do," says Radcliffe. "We minimize it – we think 'everybody yells.' We need to put yelling where we've put hitting, as a culture."

Time to declutter

After our twins were born and our lives became even more hectic with four children and very busy careers, we never had a chance to address the ever-decreasing space in our home. The diminishing elbowroom seemed to be causing more chaos and havoc among the children as they continued to grow and occupy more physical space. The more I tried to clear out some of the older toys and clothes, the more new things seemed to take over whatever space was created.

By nature, I seek some degree of orderliness, and my husband and I like to have a pleasant, presentable home environment. We love our home, but we were starting to feel like the time had come to move.

We spent 18 months canvassing houses on the market, feeling hopeful that something would become available that would meet our very specific mix of house requirements. It had to be large enough so that each child could have his/her own room, be walking distance to our synagogue, be close to our children's friends, have a spacious living and dining room (because we like to celebrate the Sabbath with lots of guests), and be within our price range.

We had no success, and finally decided to take a breather, because house hunting is quite exhausting, from both a physical and an emotional point of view. Yet, the clutter seemed to be forever building, with no solution in sight.

Finally, in December, instead of going on the trip that we had planned, my husband and I decided to take stock of our belongings and try to clear out the mess (which we would have to do anyway, to sell the house). As we sorted through the piles of old paperwork, books and toys, we realized that much of what we were storing in our already limited space, were items that we never, ever used!

With each passing day of clearing out the junk, we saw our house in a new light. It already has a large living and dining room, we are nearly next door to the synagogue, and all our kids' friends live close by and love to drop in! If we were to move our teenage daughter into her own room in the basement – which already had a large, beautiful bathroom – then she would have her own, much needed, personal space, allowing each of the boys to have his own room. Then there would be less chaos overall.

Each day of cleaning and organizing brought a new possibility for loving our existing home, so much so, that we decided to stay right where we are – and now that we weren't moving, we had more money to spend on upgrading what we have!

Although the effort to declutter and reorganize has been a lot of work, our daughter now has a brand new, beautiful room in the basement, with her own bathroom – a real haven for her and her friends. Each of our boys has his own room with everything he needs, and our family room has been reorganized so that it has more of a comfortable, leisure-based focus. We added more cupboard space in the eat-in area of our kitchen, so that pots and pans are no longer falling on my head and the drawers are no longer stuffed to the maximum!

Our house looks great, we are proud of the welcoming, organized environment that we have created, and our children have started to take ownership of their rooms, becoming much more conscious of keeping them neat.

To top it all off, we all feel less encumbered, more personally organized, and we love to come home. For me, and probably for most of us, it is important to love our immediate environment – and a decluttered personal space, leads to a decluttered mind.

WISE program gets women back to work

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When Jessie Wallace first signed up for Jewish Vocational Service Toronto's Women in Successful Employment (WISE) program, she knew she was on to something good.

"I signed up in August but had to keep cancelling because life got in the way. My coach never gave up on me, though. She kept encouraging me to come, and said that when I'm ready, they'd be there for me. Finally in December I made it," says the 49-year-old mother of two adopted children in their 30s and a 14-year-old son.

WISE is a downtown program that helps unemployed or underemployed women over age 25 find work. It offers one-on-one counselling, and teaches the skills necessary to find sustainable employment through a number of workshops that include career exploration, resumé building, cover letters, cold-calling, effective interviews and networking.

Nancy Reiner, WISE manager, says that since the office – located near Yonge and King streets – first opened almost a year ago, they have served about 325 women.

"We have four full-time employment counsellors, so we have a lot of time to spend with our clients. The idea is to create a safe environment for women so their barriers can come down.

"They gain a lot from meeting women who are in a similar situation. When they feel comfortable, they tend to share with each other."

A number of their clients are older than 40, she says, and often feel they can't get jobs because of their age. "A lot has to do with their confidence. Age can be a barrier, but it's not impossible to find employment. Many women sabotage themselves [with their attitude].

"Our job developer, who sets up job shadowing and information interviews, is in her 60s, so the women see that gainful employment is a [definite possibility]."

They see a wide range of women, from those who have not finished high school to those with graduate degrees, says Reiner. "We also see newcomers to Toronto, a number who have been laid off, and many housewives who were home raising kids for a long time and want to go back to work."

Offers counselling, teaches skills to find employment

Wallace, who ran a home-based design and construction company for 10 years, says she first thought about changing careers when she realized she was no longer getting personal satisfaction from her job. "It was a lack of joy that drove me to my decision."

She took a transition workshop first, she says, because it dealt with where to start when looking for a job. "I realized I was full of fear because I had worked at home for so long. Even putting together a resumé was frightening.

"That workshop helped me re-evaluate my skills, and helped me realize I really do have a lot to offer."

An important tip, she says, was to set up an information session with a prospective employer. "I never thought about asking a company what they can do for me. I only thought about what I can do for them. My needs have to be met as well."

What she really loves about the WISE program, she says, is the bond she created with the other women.

"As women, we all appreciate how hard we work, and what a burden we carry. It's not easy to find our own satisfaction and joy; our husbands and children always come first.

"I shared a workshop with a dentist who needed to change careers. It was empowering to see that her struggle is my struggle, and our struggle is someone else's struggle.

"Once we were in a workshop all our differences dissipated."

Networking is also a big part of the program, says Wallace. "I met one woman who wanted to learn English by working in a coffee shop and another women connected her with an employer. It's amazing to see how much you can accomplish if you talk to people."

When she was home and unemployed, she felt alone and full of shame, she says. "Coming here I felt nurtured and empowered. It's also a good way to start a routine. I get up in the morning, get my son off to school, and come on in. It is a stepping-stone to going back to work."

Champion boxer a product of Chicago's mean streets

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When Beryl Rasofsky was growing up in the mean streets of Chicago, he was so small and malnourished, he was given the nickname "Runt."

Small he may have been, but living in the "bloody twentieth," a Chicago ward also known to police and crime reporters as "bloody Maxwell," he had to be tough.

So instead of following the wishes of his father, Reb Itchik, to become a Hebrew teacher and talmudic scholar, Rasofsky fell in with a different crowd. A fighter not a scholar, he became part of a world personified by the neighbourhood hero Samuel "Nails" Morton. Morton owned a garage but was widely known for his involvement in the rackets. Nails became something of a folk hero to the twentieth's Jewish community, patrolling the neighbourhood at night and beating the you-know-what out of anybody who meant harm to his fellow Jews.

Rasofsky would take up a life of gambling, street fighting and petty crime and go on to achieve international fame as a world champion prizefighter, and later as a war hero, under his anglicized name, Barney Ross.

Ross' incredible story is the subject of a fascinating biography authored by Canadian-born Douglas Century and published by Schocken Books. Full of pathos, humour and stories of a lifestyle that seem consigned to a bygone era, Barney Ross takes the reader on a fascinating voyage back to the turn of the 20th century when Jews fought hard to make a way for themselves.

Barney Ross

Known as the "pride of the ghetto," Ross was one of several denizens of the Jewish enclave, centred on Maxwell Street, who went on to achieve fame: bandleader Benny Goodman, navy admiral Hyman Rickover, Supreme Court Justice Arthur Goldberg, actor Paul Muni, Paramount Pictures mogul Barney Balaban and William Paley, president and chair of CBS.

There was also no shortage of Jewish mobsters in Ross' neighbourhood, among them Jacob "Greasy Thumb" Guzik, the brains behind the Capone organization, and of course, Nails Morton. One small-timer who went on to some notoriety was Jacob "Sparky" Rubenstein, a volatile and hot-headed pal of Ross who became famous beyond his hoodlum/strip-club world when, as Jack Ruby, he shot Lee Harvey Oswald, John Kennedy's assassin, in November 1963.

Barney Ross is a veritable gold mine of fascinating tidbits, anecdotes and stories describing the book's protagonist and the milieu in which he lived.

Ross' father eked out a living by running a hole-in-the-wall grocery store. He was killed at age 60 when he was shot in the chest by robbers. Following his father's death, Ross' emotionally distraught mother was sent to live with a relative in Connecticut and his three youngest siblings were dispatched to the local Jewish orphanage. Ross vowed he'd raise the money to get them out of there.

A lost soul following his father's death, he descended into the Chicago underworld and was rumoured to have worked for Al Capone as a message boy.

When Ross first entered the ring, he was following in the footsteps of numerous fellow Jews. The people of the book were so prominent in boxing, Century notes, they may have accounted for one-third the total number of fighters. Ross was only 15 when, inspired no doubt by Jackie Fields, a successful boxer from his neighbourhood, he began serious training.

At first he hid his involvement in the sport from his mother, who had returned to Chicago and who would have disapproved, but by 1929 he had gained some fame and was a featherweight Golden Gloves winner.

In the early '30s, he was one of three members of boxing's "holy trinity," three fighters who would each one day be inducted into the Boxing Hall of Fame. Ross' lightweight championship bouts against "Tough Tony" Canzaneri are, according to Century, still considered classics – the second in September 1933 is described as a "glowing gladiatorial spectacle."

Ross eventually held three world titles, and thanks to his first win, he was able to set up his mother in a comfortable home and bring his brothers and sister out of the orphanage.

In the mid-'30s, Ross was on top of the boxing world, rubbing shoulders with celebrities, being invited to the best restaurants, enjoying the good life.

But already, the signs were there that the good times wouldn't last. His love of gambling was becoming a big problem and Century notes that after a win over Ceferino Garcia, he blew the entire $18,000 purse in a few hours, "betting wrong on eight [horse] races out of eight."

Ross' career came to an end in a championship match against Henry Armstrong in which he was brutally manhandled. He ended his career in 1938 with a record of 74 wins, four losses and three ties.

Ross came down hard after the highs of his fight career. His younger brother recalls how Barney spent all his money and was down and out when World War II started. Ross enlisted in the Marines and, at 33, was known to other marines as "grandpa."

In 1942, Ross took part in the battle for Guadalcanal, a Pacific island held by the Japanese. Century's description of Ross' life and death struggle is intense, noting that Ross, wounded and pinned down, recited the Shema many times while fending off furious Japanese attacks.

After receiving the Silver Star for bravery, Ross was shipped back to San Diego. By then he was taking morphine in excess – at first it was administered to relieve the pain of his shrapnel wounds. Back in the United States, he beat his narcotic addiction and later would encourage others to do so as well. He also pioneered a practice later adopted by many celebrities of using his fame to advance a political cause. In his case, it was to bring attention to the murder of Europe's Jews.

Toward the end of the war, he aligned himself with the "Bergson Group," a small band of Zionists allied with Revisionist leader Vladimir Jabotinsky and in 1948 Ross is reported to have called on his underworld connections to run guns for the Irgun militia.

A hard man who could pummel an opponent and who could hold off a Japanese attack single-handed, Ross was beloved by his contemporaries. When he was down and out and diagnosed with terminal cancer in 1966, the fight community and numerous celebrities came to his aid with contributions to help his family.

He died on Jan. 10, 1967, at the age of 57.

They don't make fighters like Ross anymore – hard men who gained public respect for their community and who were heroes for their fellow Jews. Century's moving account of Ross' life shouldn't be missed.

News or entertainment?

Sandie Benitah
20Something

When Brangelina (Brad Pitt and Angelina Jolie) announced they were having a baby, I called at least five of my girlfriends to debate the issue.

When Jessica Simpson and Nick Lachey decided to call it quits, I had a knot in my stomach all day.

I don't subscribe to US magazine and I don't own a Team Aniston T-shirt, not because I don't want to, but because then my deep, dark secret would be out: I am a full-fledged celebrity junkie.

I know I'm not the only one out there enjoying this guilty pleasure. On a recent flight to San Francisco, I sat beside a girl who was reading the latest speculation on Britney Spears' weight. It took all I had not to tell her that a more reliable source was saying the pop star was pregnant again. In front of me was a woman about 40, reading another tabloid and discussing with her friend how much Denise Richard's daughter looked like Charlie Sheen.

I looked at my boyfriend, thinking what I could say to engage him in a conversation about Hollywood. "Think TomKat's faking it?" I asked. He stared at me blankly before returning to his National Geographic magazine.

Celebrity culture is fascinating to me, not because I have illusions of making it in Hollywood, but because in a way, it tells us about ourselves.

Tabloids are filled with lashon harah. What could be worse than reading about the success and mishaps of people? Maybe that's why they call tabloids a "guilty pleasure."

On the other hand, don't newspapers do the same thing? Entertainment is just another form of storytelling, and people who read the Globe and Mail instead of People magazine are guilty of the same pleasure. For example, I know some people who never even really knew who Wayne Gretzky was before the media started referring to him as Betzky. All of a sudden, the illegal gambling ring he allegedly knew of is shaping up to be the story of the year. Throw in the possibility of his wife betraying him and now you've got a soap opera that even my boyfriend can't stop talking about.

The news we read today reads like a tabloid. But don't blame the reporters because it's their job to be storytellers.

Even days after 9/11 hit, people were still glued to their TVs, not because they were interested in new information, but because they couldn't tear themselves away from the horrifying images. As tragic as it was, the images played out like a movie and so tragedy became our entertainment. Treating current events like entertainment is dangerous, as now the media feeds into our constant need to be amused.

If you look at the arts and entertainment section of any major newspaper today, you won't only find news on the new opera centre. I guarantee you'll find the juiciest Hollywood tidbits of the day. The line of distinction between news and entertainment has been blurred.

More news stories today are being made into scandals and sensationalized until we can't tear ourselves away from them. Remember the Beltway Sniper in the States? I was actually disappointed with the way it ended. I caught myself thinking how I would write the ending differently before reminding myself it wasn't a TV movie but a real life saga.

The Liberal sponsorship scandal reminds me of an episode of The Sopranos. And the fuss being made over David Emerson crossing the parliamentary floor to a Conservative portfolio a day after he was elected as a Liberal reminds me of how Nicole Richie must have felt when her best friend Paris Hilton crossed the dance-club floor to link arms with Rod Stewart's daughter Kimberly and announce she wanted Kim to be her new sidekick on The Simple Life.

There are some people who can tell the difference between news and entertainment. When the Toronto Star ran a huge picture of Britney and her husband K-Fed on its front page early last year, the paper received scores of angry letters, condemning it for lack of news judgment.

But that was the only copy of the Star I bought that month. A couple of my girlfriends, who never interest themselves with newspapers, bought copies too.

Being a celebrity junkie is pathetic, I know. I guess I'm just a sucker for a good story.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I hate exchanging gifts with my mother-in-law. This woman can tell you what I gave her for any occasion for the past 20 years!

She has an amazing bookkeeping system. She knows who gave what and what they spent (approximately), and she reciprocates with a gift that is the same value as what was given to her. My husband says she's always been that way. How are you supposed to give a gift from your heart if she uses this cold, calculating system for every present she receives?

She does the same with phone calls. Last year, she was in the hospital for a week, and she can tell you exactly who called and visited, and how many times. She also knows who sent flowers, a card or a basket.

She is a lovely woman, but this aspect of her makes me crazy! Should I just come out and tell her how rude and ridiculous she is being?

Gift Tracker

Dear Gift Tracker

The system your mother-in-law follows is not that unique. Many people do this all the time. Some people even do it without consciously realizing they're doing it.

You are not going to change how your mother-in-law handles the receiving and giving of gifts or phone calls. She has been doing this for many years and isn't going to change her ways now.

This doesn't make her a bad person, only a hard person to buy gifts for, as she is always calculating worth instead of appreciating thought and effort.

But don't let her ways change you. Continue giving in the way you are accustomed to. Gift-giving is something that makes people feel really good, especially if they are giving from the heart. Giving out of obligation does not have the same rewards. I'm not sure that making waves about this will accomplish anything, though it may encourage her to be more discreet.

I'm glad to hear that aside from this unfortunate trait of hers, you feel she is a wonderful woman. Look past this character flaw and try not to let her bring you down.

Do we have a sense of humour?

Perhaps I know best why it is man alone who laughs; he alone suffers so deeply that he had to invent laughter. – Friedrich Nietzsche

I am thankful for laughter, except when milk comes out of my nose. – Woody Allen

When I think about the Toronto Jewish community in the context of humour, laughter, joking and wit, I associate it more with Nietzche's quote than with Woody Allen's.

I say this because for months I have tried to write a column on this town's funnybone – the harebrained and slapstick side of Jewish Toronto. I searched high and low for the belly laughs, but I just couldn't find them. My failed investigation seemed to be saying that we are a suffering and maudlin group

There must be something I missed, however – a place, maybe in the aisles of our kosher meat markets or at our shul kiddushes, where a gut-aching silliness would make me keel over and force me to scarf down an entire roll of flavoured Tums.

Maybe if I look closely enough, I might uncover something quirky that will elicit uncontrollable hilarity.

Perhaps it can be found in the front offices of our local synagogues. Now, calling a shul office can be maddening, but at the same time, a hoot. As an example, you know when you call your temple that: a) 99 times out of 100, the rabbi will be out, even if he's in; b) the secretary will be broiges (that's Yiddish for "upset") about something that happened 10 years ago; and c) you'll be put on hold for what seems like forever and forced to listen to a tape of Kol Nidre by Yossele Rosenblatt.

Going into a Jewish bakery used to be quite an event, one I look back on and chuckle unabashedly about. One bakery I patronized was staffed by elderly women who would, upon my arrival, ask me in piercingly loud voices why I wasn't religious, why I was single and how come I didn't get a haircut and "look decent like the other boys." I was never sure who the "other" boys were. I just wanted to buy a sliced rye. After spending thousands of dollars on therapy, I took my business elsewhere, to a place where buying kaiser buns and rum balls was simple and not accompanied by an intense interrogation that left me feeling responsible for all the ills of the Jewish world.

And then there are the comedians in our community who bring laughter to the lives of even the most stern, staid and sober among us. My good friend Alan Robbins – known to some as Adar – is one such person. Alan is an extremely good-hearted, learned and caring Jew whose mission in life is to call it as he sees it. He is one of the community b'adranim (comics).

He's a bit like a frum Lenny Bruce. He's able to detect the hilarious underpinnings of most situations, and he makes sure that everyone in a room knows who is right wing or left wing, and he makes us all aware of the strange things that happen to our bodies as we age, including excessive hair growth in strange places. He is belligerent in an endearing way, and I have seen him cause milk to come out of people's noses as he makes them cackle like hyenas.

So here's the deal, schlemiel. E-mail me something about the Toronto Jewish community that made your head fall off and roll down Clark Avenue. I'll try to include it in a followup column on my quest to uncover the merriment of the Toronto Jewish community.

The funniest example will get to ride in a Chabad van and sing Heveinu Shalom Alechem on their loudspeaker.

At our events, the problem isn't getting people to dance.

It's getting them to sit down again.

So, a few desserts don't get eaten.
Tell the catering staff it has absolutely nothing to do with them ...
... if you can get them to stop dancing.

You've got it all, and now you're planning to upgrade?

You have a state-of-the-art modern facility for up to 500 guests, ensconced in a historic setting.

It's surrounded by magnificently landscaped lawns, gardens, and terraces, themselves encircled by several acres of virgin forest brimming with fauna — so spectacular they've been certified as conservation land by the American Audubon society.

You have this entire little Camelot — all 22 acres of it — situated smack dab in the middle of Toronto, with ample onsite parking.

You have a palatial kitchen staffed by an army of distinguished chefs, including a full-time pastry chef.

You recently upgraded your banquet facilities to the tune of $3 million.

You have a 7,000 sq. ft. ballroom equipped with state-of-the art sound, lighting, and projection facilities.

You have not one but two magnificently landscaped terraces.

You have a permanent onsite art gallery featuring works by noted artists.

You have valet parking, a dreamlike French country brides room, onsite childcare services, and guestroom rates at a major luxury hotel for your guests.

In other words, you have the ultimate in high tech combined with the warmth and character of century-old surroundings in the quintessential green setting.

What haven't you got? And why do you need to upgrade? Hasn't anyone ever told you that better is the enemy of good?

Apparently not. "When it comes to creating an appealing environment for our guests, the sky's the limit," says Catering Director Deborah Muise. "Once you set a certain standard and establish a level of service, you can only go up from there; we have 133 years of history to live up to."

Part of that standard is upping the ante on gourmet cuisine. The Granite Club's chefs, headed by renowned Executive Chef Nigel Didock, are on the cutting edge of culinary trends; the innovations and geographic subtleties offered at Toronto's finest restaurants are concurrently reflected in the Granite's special event menus. Indeed, a fair share of those innovations originate in the Granite Club's kitchen.

Another part of the standard is upgrading the lawns and gardens. The Granite Club's already-lush frontage is being enhanced by the planting of additional flower beds and the construction of a lattice archway, to be enrobed with ivy and seasonal flowers.

The entire grounds, in fact, keep a full landscaping team busy maintaining and improving flora rivalling that of a botanical garden.

At the Granite Club, however, such improvements don't qualify as oneupsmanship; they're merely business as usual. "We owe it to our members and guests to make their function the very best it can be," says Muise. "Every member of our team is focused on making your simcha the fairy-tale event you envision, and we're honoured to have the opportunity to host it."

Traditionally private, for special events the Granite Club welcomes the community and members alike.

When planning an event, you normally have to whittle down your perfect-world wish list to a realistic size. At the Granite Club, you simply add to it.

WAITING TO GO HOME: Thousands of Falas Mora, formerly Jewish Ethiopians converted to Christianity, wait in Gondar, Ethiopia, for the news that they will soon be on their way to Israel. Last month, a United Israel Appeal-Federations Canada group visited the Gondar camp to help launch a special rescue program for the remaining Falas Mora. Please see the related story on page 18. [Victor Yagoda photo]

Shocked Paris mourns murder victim

The image of Ilan Halimi was displayed at a memorial ceremony last week in Paris at La Grande Synagogue de la Victoire. Halimi was kidnapped, tortured and brutally murdered in what officials described as a hate crime directed against Jews. French President Jacques Chirac and Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin attended the ceremony. On Sunday, tens of thousands of people demonstrated in Paris against racism and anti-Semitism. A suspect in the murder was arrested in the Ivory Coast. Please see related stories on pages 4 and 28. [RNS/Reuters photo]

Rothstein nominated to Supreme Court

Will become body's third Jewish member

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

On Monday, Canadians were treated to a first in Canadian politics – a Supreme Court nominee being questioned by parliamentarians about his judicial philosophy and previous High Court decisions.

Federal Court Justice Marshall Rothstein, a native of Winnipeg, has gained a reputation as a prominent voice on intellectual property matters, but he was expected to also answer questions about hot-button issues, including abortion, medicare and school funding. Though MPs have been given three hours to question Rothstein, unlike their counterparts in the United States, they do not have the authority to veto a nominee.

Named from a list of jurists prepared by the previous Liberal government, Rothstein was appointed to the court by Prime Minister Stephen Harper. He will become the third Jewish member of the nine-member Supreme Court, joining Rosalie Abella of Toronto and Morris Fish of Montreal.

Rothstein is widely praised as a fair-minded and hardworking jurist whose decisions in some circumstances broke new ground. One of his more controversial decisions – later overturned by the Supreme Court – was the Harvard mouse case, which examined whether a genetically modified mouse could be patented. Applying the Patent Act, Rothstein ruled it could, later explaining that the moral and social implications in the case were policy issues better addressed in Parliament than in the courts.

The News in Brief

Canada

Jews Named As Critics

OTTAWA — Four Jewish MPs were named by Opposition leader Bill Graham to the Liberal shadow cabinet. They are Raymonde Folco (Laval-Les-Isles), official languages; Irwin Cotler (Mount-Royal), public safety; Anita Neville (Winnipeg South Centre), Indian Affairs; and Ontario MP Susan Kadis (Thornhill), associate critic for infrastructure and communities.

Matas Gets Award

VANCOUVER — Winnipeg human rights lawyer David Matas, senior legal counsel for B'nai Brith Canada, received the man of the year award from the B.C.-based Brotherhood Interfaith Society at a dinner last Saturday evening in Richmond. Founded in 1996, the society's constituent groups come from the Muslim, Jewish and Christian communities. Matas was honoured for his work with numerous charitable groups.

World

Harvard Prez Resigns

BOSTON — Lawrence Summers, the Jewish president of Harvard University, resigned last week. Among the many controversies that dogged him in his five years at Harvard were remarks against efforts by universities to divest from firms that do business with Israel. He called such sanctions "anti-Semitic in their effect if not their intent."

Mayor Slags Israel

ROME — Italian Jewish leaders and politicians are calling for the resignation of a mayor who took part in a pro-Palestinian demonstration. After participating in the Feb. 18 demonstration in Rome, Mauro Bertini, the Communist mayor of the town of Marano, suggested the world would be better off without Israel, which he called a "punch in the stomach of humanity." Pierferdinando Casini, president of Italy's lower house of parliament, called the remarks "shameful and irresponsible."

Ahmadinejad Sued

BERLIN — An Israeli lawyer is suing Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in Germany for Holocaust denial. Ervin Eran Shahar filed suit with the German Federal Prosecutors' Office in Karlsruhe last week, asking it to press charges against Ahmadinejad for repeated statements questioning the Shoah. Holocaust denial is a crime in Germany. Shahar acknowledged that Ahmadinejad is not German and may enjoy diplomatic immunity, but he argued that prosecution in absentia would send an important political message. The prosecutors' office had no immediate comment.

Footballer Still Fascist

ROME — An Italian soccer player repeated his pro-fascist views after meeting with Holocaust survivors last month. But Lazio's Paolo di Canio also called Italy's wartime anti-Semitic actions unjust and "terrible." He and other Lazio and Roma players met three survivors at Rome's city hall in an encounter set up by the mayor. An admirer of wartime dictator Benito Mussolini, di Canio has been fined twice for giving fascist salutes at matches. "My ideas remain the same, but I don't want it to sound as if I believe in violence," he said after the meeting.

Jews Join Mardi Gras

NEW ORLEANS — Two Jewish groups, Krewe de Jieux and Krewe du Mishigas, took part last month in the first parade of New Orleans' Mardi Gras season. The city's first post-Hurricane Katrina Mardi Gras was scaled back to eight days from the usual two weeks.

Jews Help Churches

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. — The Jewish community of Birmingham, Ala., is reaching out to 10 churches hit by a rash of recent arsons in rural parts of the state between Feb. 3 and Feb. 14. All the churches have been Baptist, and six of them burned to the ground. Racial motives are being discounted, since half of the churches were black and half were white. After the first six churches burned, the Birmingham Jewish Federation donated $1,000 from its reserve fund to help rebuild them. After the other arsons, that was raised to $2,000. The American Jewish Committee has also offered a $5,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of the arsonists.

Panel Raps Red Ken

LONDON — London Mayor Ken Livingstone was rapped for comparing a Jewish journalist to a Nazi. The Adjudication Panel of England, which hears complaints against local officials, found Livingstone guilty Feb. 24 of disreputable conduct and said a decision on a penalty was pending. The three-person panel's ruling comes after Livingstone last year asked a critical Jewish reporter from London's Evening Standard if he was a "German war criminal" and said he was acting "like a concentration camp guard." The mayor is a longtime critic of Israel and a friend of an anti-Zionist imam.

Court Orders Ruling

WASHINGTON — A U.S. appeals court ordered a lower court to rule on whether a U.S. citizen born in Jerusalem can have "Israel" alone inscribed as the place of birth. The Feb. 17 decision sends the case of Menachem Zivotofsky, 3, back to the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia. That court said a request to list the boy as born in "Jerusalem, Israel" was a political matter, not a judicial one, and refused to rule. His parents now want only "Israel" listed as his birthplace. The State Department is defending the case. The United States doesn't recognize Israeli sovereignty in Jerusalem.

Venerable Jewish Paper Names New Editor

LONDON — The London Jewish Chronicle has hired veteran British journalist David Rowan as its new editor.

Rowan was named to head the paper after the resignation of Ned Temko, who had been editor since 1990 and resigned to be chief political correspondent for the Observer.

David Rowan

The world's oldest Jewish newspaper, the Chronicle has been published for 165 years and has a circulation of about 34,000.

Rowan writes for the Times of London and is the media interviewer for the London Evening Standard. He previously worked for the Guardian and the Guardian Unlimited website.

Tory comments on school funding well received

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Advocates of public funding for Jewish day schools are buoyed by the recent comments of Ontario Progressive Conservative leader John Tory supporting the issue, and say they must now fundraise for a public relations campaign to bring politicians and the public onside.

Tory told more than 1,000 delegates attending a three-day policy conference in Niagara Falls last month that he's committed to finding a way to help parents with children in independent and private schools.

Ontario's Catholic schools are fully funded by the province, but no other faith-based schools are, and the PC leader framed the issue in terms of fairness.

"I am still completely and totally committed to ensuring that part of our platform for the 2007 election is a policy which addresses the fairness issue for independent schools," he told reporters. "It's fair to say that the issue of fairness more starkly presents itself when you are dealing with faith-based schools as opposed to others."

He added that he has "come to understand even better the fact that there is a fairness issue that needs to be addressed."

Tory's remarks were not all that different from those he made in an interview with The CJN in late 2004. At the time, he said he favoured the reinstatement of the Equity in Education Tax Credit (EETC), which the Liberals had repealed in 2003, "but... I intend to engage in a broad process of consultation, both within my own party and outside it, with people who have children in independent schools, with educators, [and] with members of my party, to frankly improve the policy."

He added in the interview that he would consider two important changes: income testing so that more support went to those with lower incomes, and better accountability from schools.

Tory also said at the time that while he would not limit help to faith-based schools only, "the fairness argument applies more explicitly to faith-based schools."

He expressed much the same sentiments at the Niagara Falls policy conference, which was attended by a contingent of Jewish parents and funding advocates.

"The scope of who it applies to has not been decided," he said. "But the issue itself that is clear, that has to be looked at, where the fairness issue applies directly, is to faith-based schools."

And he said financial assistance will likely go to parents rather than schools.

"My own predisposition is it should be provided to parents, but we're not there yet."

He indicated that any financial help will likely be in the form of tax credits.

Tory rejected doing away with the Catholic separate system, and said the key issue is to strike a balance between funding private schools and maintaining "a quality public education system."

Ira Walfish, co-chair of the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools (OAJDS), who attended the weekend PC conference, said the major difference between Tory's comments a year ago to The CJN and those this month to fellow Conservatives is that "now they're putting together a platform."

Walfish noted that a white paper on education the party produced does not discuss funding private or faith-based schools. Even so, "it's very much on the agenda now."

The issue was raised at the conference at a seminar on education that was attended by several Jewish parents from Toronto and chaired by Conservative MPP Frank Klees.

"It was great," Walfish said. "The Christian advocates were there too, and they really made the case."

Tory himself attended a Friday night dinner hosted by the Jewish parents at the hotel where the conference took place, and the PC leader "said all the right things," Walfish said. "He hasn't made up his mind on whether [funding] should go to only faith-based schools or not, but he was very positive."

The next step is for the OAJDS and others to raise funds for a "professional and serious" public campaign.

A recent e-mailing to parents of children in Jewish day schools urged that the issue be presented as one of discrimination.

Perhaps they understand

From the editor's desk

The rioting and rage in most of the Muslim world last month that greeted the publication in September – five months ago – of the cartoon caricatures of Muhammad have been quite instructive.

Out of all proportion to the "offence," the massive umbrage was clearly an orchestrated manipulation by malevolent leaders, mostly in Iran and Syria. Their purposes were many: to further alienate ordinary Muslims from the ways of the West, to distract world attention from their own ongoing international mischief and to make the western world shudder.

Alas, they succeeded in all respects.

The hysterics, mass rampage, arson and ultimately even killing, were alarming and frightening. Do the demonstrators and their leaders place no value on human life?

The spectacle of public officials declaring a boycott of Danish products or demanding a formal apology from the Danish government was eye-opening and disillusioning. Does the governing elite in Muslim society understand nothing about the nature of democracy and the relationship between government and a free, independent press?

But the absurd "equal-treatment" call by various Iranian luminaries for an editorial contest lampooning the Holocaust was disgusting. It was further evidence of a dangerous inrooting of profound ignorance among the leaders of that society. Cynically cultivated by the likes of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, the outgrowth of that ignorance is hatred of Israel and Jews. Like a poisoned mushroom, it infects everyone who ingests it.

But not only Iranians consume. Hatred of and incitement towards Jews and Israel are rampant throughout the Muslim world, a spreading malignancy of intolerance and violence.

The West is not immune. Muslims in western countries too have been influenced by leaders who abuse their followers' trust and prey upon their gullibilities with calumnies and lies about Jews and Israel.

Last month in Paris, a young Jew, Ilan Halimi, was savagely tortured and murdered, his naked, burned, handcuffed body thrown into the streets like detritus in a sewer. He had been kidnapped. But ransom wasn't the key purpose of his kidnapping. Murder-of-a-Jew was.

At first, French authorities did not believe that religious hatred was the motive for the crime. But they soon understood otherwise. France was in shock.

Speaking to the Conseil Représentatif des Institutions Juives de France (CRIF) on Feb. 20, French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin conveyed his personal condolences to the family of Ilan Halimi "who are mourning their son, murdered in tragic circumstances… I want them to know that we shall do our utmost to ensure the perpetrators of this barbaric crime are arrested and brought to justice." (A suspect has since been arrested. Please see the related story in this paper.)

De Villepin's remarks to the CRIF are important to note. There was an urgency to his presentation because of the three-headed menace that served as the backdrop for those remarks: the Halimi murder, the dangerous posturing of Iran and the election of a Hamas majority in the West Bank and Gaza. He spoke to all three matters.

"I want to speak from the heart and tell you forcefully, with conviction: the fight against anti-Semitism is an absolute priority for me because I feel responsible for the safety of you all and because anti-Semitism is the negation of the Republican spirit."

De Villepin elaborated on some of judicial, policing and security measures his government had enacted to deal with anti-Semitism. He referred to the fight against anti-Semitism as "a moral duty." And indeed, he reported a 47 per cent decrease in reported incidents of anti-Semitism in 2005 over the previous year.

"The French Republic is well aware of the debt it owes its Jewish citizens… France therefore bears a particular responsibility in the fight against anti-Semitism and racism of every kind, both on its own soil and throughout the world."

On the subject of Iran, de Villepin reconfirmed his "shared determination [with Russian President Vladimir Putin] to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons."

He added: "President Ahmadinejad's comments [on the Holocaust and Israel's existence] are disgraceful. France has firmly and unreservedly condemned them. We cannot tolerate international dialogue being derailed by unacceptably provocative statements which offend Israel, the Jewish people and the honour of the entire international community."

On the subject of Hamas and the Middle East, de Villepin was unequivocal. "France will never compromise on Israel's security. France will always be at Israel's side in our absolute rejection of terrorism, fanaticism and violence… We have laid down three principles for dialogue with any Palestinian government: the renunciation of violence, recognition of the State of Israel and recognition of the agreements signed in the past by Israel and the PLO. Those principles are an absolute prerequisite for dialogue between the French authorities and the future Palestinian government emerging from the latest election."

Then, he repeated: "We shall be at Israel's side." Of course, France's credibility on matters relating to Israel and the Middle East, historically, has been somewhat shaky. But if de Villepin, and indeed all western leaders, have finally understood the correlation between hatred of the Jews and danger to the West, perhaps, credibility will no longer be an issue.

Travel to Israel surges to 2 million – and climbing

Ministry sets target at 5 million visitors in 2009

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Israel has enjoyed a remarkable resurgence in tourist travel in the last two years, but as far as officials of the country's Ministry of Tourism are concerned, the best is yet to come.

Eli Cohen, director general of the ministry, believes that with targeted marketing and given increased demand for travel to Israel, last year's number of two million visitors can easily be eclipsed in 2006 and grow from there.

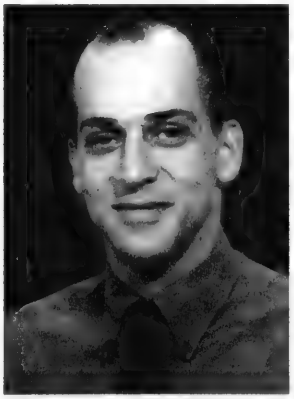
The Tourism Ministry has set a target of five million visitors in 2009, said Arie Sommer, consul and tourism commissioner for North and South America. One million of the visitors are expected to hail from North America.

Cohen and Sommer were in Toronto last week where they met community leaders, travel industry professionals and the media to encourage travel to Israel.

Canadians and people from the rest of the world no longer are deterred by the security situation in Israel, said Cohen. What is holding back an influx of Canadian visitors is the "lack of capacity in airplane seats" and "big prices in tickets."

Last year, approximately 50,000 Canadians visited the Jewish state, but the ministry believes that could grow by as much as 30 per cent in 2006 and double by 2007.

Cohen said tourism is a major factor in the health of the Israeli economy. Every 100,000 tourists generate $200 million (US) in revenue and leads to the employment of 4,000 Israelis. He said the Israeli government has taken steps at home to make it easier for airlines to fly into Israel, amending regulations to permit an extra 400,000 passengers to arrive in the Jewish state in 2005 and early 2006. He challenged airlines in Canada to lower their prices and make more seats available for travellers to Israel.



Eli Cohen

Airlines flying direct to Israel charge up to $1,000 during the slow winter season, but the fares could be as low as $200 at that time, he suggested. As for the high season when fares as high as $2,000 are charged, he said prices could instead be in the $700 to $800 range. Asking a family of five to spend $10,000 on airfare alone is a clear disincentive to travel to Israel, he added.

Cohen said Canadians can take their cue from airlines in Europe, which have slashed fares. Where airlines once charged up to $1,000 for a return trip from Frankfurt to Tel Aviv, now passengers can travel on charter for a return fare of less than $200, he said.

Dani Shahal, the Toronto-based consul for tourism, said his office may soon announce additional low-cost flights to Israel from Toronto via England on a British charter carrier.

Travel to Israel from Italy, Spain, Poland, Hungary, Ukraine and Russia doubled in 2005, while Britain, France and Germany were also important sources of travellers. Germany is expected to send more than 200,000 people to Israel in 2006 and the ministry believes as many as 500,000 British travellers may visit Israel in 2007, Cohen said.

People around the world are discovering Israel as a safe destination that has more to offer than its religious heritage, Cohen said. "Israel is becoming more and more a typical tourist destination, with sea and sun, city-scapes, trips to Eilat."

Thanks to low-cost airfares, Europeans are booking three-day, two-night trips. Some are even coming to Israel to shop, as prices, by European standards, are relatively cheap, Cohen said.

Tel Aviv has developed a reputation as a European-style city with a vibrant nightlife. Other parts of the country are advertising their unique attractions, such as desert jeep safaris, Dead Sea spas and Galilee bed and breakfasts. Ministry of Tourism marketing efforts are asking visitors to abandon their preconceptions of Israel and discover the country's fun side, Cohen said.

Schechter Institute president at Toronto conference

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

From ignorance to the Internet, seven key challenges are confronting Judaism in the 21st century, says Rabbi David Golinkin, president of the Schechter Institute in Jerusalem.

Rabbi David Golinkin, keynote speaker at a Torah in Toronto evening of study, sponsored by the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, said that disunity among Jews, ignorance about the religion, lack of observance, individualism, assimilation, medical ethics and the influence of technology are the key challenges for Judaism in the modern world.

Rabbi David Golinkin

"Unfortunately, we see much disunity and divisiveness [among Jews today]," said the rabbi, who holds a PhD in Talmud.

"The lessons of Jewish history [teach us] disunity leads to catastrophe and unity can lead to redemption."

To foster unity, Rabbi Golinkin encourages Jews from different streams to "meet with their counterparts."

He also cited the need for rabbis from different denominations to be on the same page with respect to recognizing conversions to Judaism.

Rabbi Golinkin noted most Jews have little knowledge of the religion and the solution to that is bolstering the quality and quantity of Jewish education.

"There is a tremendous need for serious Jewish education in North America… and bringing serious Jewish studies into the Israeli public school system," he said, adding educational outreach to Russian-speaking Jews should be a priority.

Most Jews do not practise the faith and the rabbi views this lack of observance as a major roadblock to Jewish continuity.

"Without Jewish observance, there is no future for Jews," the rabbi asserted.

"We need to teach Jews commitment to observance and also how to observe."

To that end, he suggested offering "hands-on workshops" on how to observe.

Individualism, a philosophy that is believed and practised widely in North America, is another threat to Judaism, said the rabbi.

"The antidote to this is that we need to teach Jewish peoplehood in our schools," Rabbi Golinkin said.

"We have to show it's not enough to think about 'you,' we have to think about 'us.'"

The rabbi said that Jews all over the world are "bombarded by pop culture," which he feels is dragging them away from their Jewishness.

With medical advances growing by the day, a variety of ethical questions have arisen about how to simultaneously honour Jewish law, while promoting health and wellness.

Abortion, euthanasia and artificial insemination are just a few of such issues.

"We need to use our collective wisdom in order to deal with medical issues," stated Rabbi Golinkin, noting he recently served on a commission in Israel that helped craft a law regarding end-of-life issues.

The final conundrum described by Rabbi Golinkin is the Internet and the pervasive influence the computer and other forms of technology have on our lives.

In one sense, the Internet can provide people with easy access to Jewish knowledge, he said.

Yet using technology may take away the time people need for studying Torah.

"Computers and the Internet have taken over a sizable chunk of our lives," he said.

"How can we limit [technology's influence] so we still have time to study Torah?"

Watch for full interview with Rabbi Golinkin in next week's issue of The CJN.

World allows for both Bible and evolution: rabbi

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

While they are often pitted against each other, the Bible's concept of how the world was created and the theory of evolution are not incompatible, according to various rabbis.

Referring to the writings of prominent rabbis dating back hundreds of years, Rabbi Wayne Allen recently told a small group attending a Torah in Toronto session, sponsored by the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, that Judaism allows for believing in both modern and traditional views about the origins of earth.

"Creation and evolution are not in conflict," Rabbi Allen said.

"Judaism can support an understanding of evolution that is compatible with our observance of Torah."

The theory of evolution holds that species are related to one another through common descent and over time, they evolve and change to adapt to their surroundings.

In the Bible, God is described as the supreme being behind the creation of everything in the universe.

Rabbi Allen cited the writings of such revered rabbis as Maimonides and Abraham Isaac Kook to illustrate that these two theories are not mutually exclusive.

Paraphrasing Maimonides, the 12th- century Jewish philosopher, Rabbi Allen explained that the biblical story of creation expresses obscure ideas that are not exact, meaning we should not accept them as the exact truth.

"What the Torah is doing is trying to create a word picture… [of creation]. We shouldn't compromise our understanding of science in accordance with it," Allen said of Maimonide's argument.

"Torah is not exactly telling us facts as they are - Torah is telling us ideas and those ideas are obscure."

Rabbi Allen also referred to a commentary composed by Rabbi Israel Lipschitz in Poland in 1842, which discusses the discoveries of dinosaur remains.

"God creates creatures of some sort and they evolve and change. Some die out, but we also develop new species," Rabbi Allen said in interpreting Rabbi Lipschitz's commentary.

"It's the spirit of God that infuses all of these creatures [and their subsequent] evolution."

Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook went even further in 1938 when he wrote that evolution clearly illustrates God's brilliance.

"God created a world that allows for evolution to take place," Rabbi Allen paraphrased Rabbi Kook.

"Because evolution teaches us things change for a greater possibility of long-term survival, it is telling us God is even more brilliant than we thought."

A subsequent Torah in Toronto session focused on the challenges Jewish students face on university and college campuses.

Rabbis Sean and Jennifer Gorman, the session's leaders, said the biggest dilemma Jewish students grapple with is meeting fellow Jews.

"The issue brought up to us [most frequently] is where do you go to meet Jews on campus," noted Rabbi Jennifer Gorman.

"Where do you go to make long-term relationships?"

The rabbis encouraged students to get involved with Jewish student groups, such as Hillel and Koach, not only as a means for developing relationships with Jews, but also to band together to combat anti-Semitism.

"As students, you're not capable of fighting that fight alone," said Rabbi Sean Gorman.

"You need to be part of Jewish student organizations."

Israeli dance festival for children at York U

At the festival, nearly 400 dancers, from 18 schools, will burst onto the floor in a blue and white kaleidoscope of motion. Nirkoda Israeli Dancers, the Chai Dancers, and Dor L'Dor, a group formed from Grade 2 students and parents, will make special presentations.

Rikudiyah brings Jewish youth closer to their culture and heritage, connecting them to Israel.

From its start in a tiny classroom in the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre packed with 40 children, Rikudiyah has blossomed into a spectacular display of joy and excitement that is Israeli dance.

Over 36 years, thousands of children have been involved with Rikudiyah. "I was so excited, I can't wait until next year," said one child. That's a typical comment from a festival participant.

Dance teacher/choreographer Teme Kernerman conceived and initiated the festival, inspired by her training and experience in New York in the mid-1950s. Her non-competitive format ensures that no child has to audition. She insists that all instructors dance with their groups, reinforcing that this is a performance without pressure. Chai means life and to celebrate this memorable "double chai" year, a special commemorative pin has been commissioned and will be presented to the participating children at the festival.

Rikudiyah 2006 is co-sponsored by the Koffler Centre of the Arts, Bathurst Jewish Community Centre and UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education.

This annual community celebration takes place on Sunday, April 2, 2:30 p.m. at York University, Tait McKenzie Building.

The issue of fairness

John Tory is a man of conscience. Last month, the leader of the Opposition at Queen's Park went on record saying he was determined to right the widely acknowledged wrong that has persisted in Ontario's system of public funding for faith-based schools: only Catholic schools in Ontario receive funding from the government, while all other faith-based schools do not. The Supreme Court of Canada and the Human Rights Committee of the United Nations have ruled the practice to be blatantly unfair. Yet it persists.

"I am still completely and totally committed to ensuring that part of our platform for the 2007 election is a policy which addresses the fairness issue for independent schools… The issue of fairness more starkly presents itself when you are dealing with faith-based schools as opposed to others," he told a policy conference in Niagara Falls last month.

But Tory is also a man of courage, for he knew his commitment would rile much of the powerful mainstream media. The Globe and Mail and Toronto Star, for example, immediately pounced on him criticizing him for, essentially, jeopardizing the public system. "As the Star has noted before…, the system is indeed unfair," the paper's editorial of Feb. 22 said. "But the answer is not to inflict further damage on the public system."

As we, too, have noted before, there is no credible evidence that, if the issue is handled responsibly, the public school system would be damaged by introducing some element of funding fairness toward other faith-based schools. Indeed, some experts argue that any small measure of competition that might result from fair funding would only enhance the public system.

We understand that the idea of funding fairness legitimately evokes reasonable concerns for the public system by thoughtful, fair-minded individuals. And we do not disparage or make light of them. However, to allay those concerns, the following points must be made:

• Ontario is the only jurisdiction in Canada that refuses to extend any funding to non-Catholic, faith-based schools. British Columbia, Alberta, Manitoba and Quebec do so, and no one suggests their public school systems have been harmed as a result.

• Non-Catholic, faith-based schools seek funding only for the general, non-religious portion of their schools' programs.

• The total estimated amount involved, $200 million to $300 million, is a relatively small portion of Ontario's more than $10-billion annual education budget.

• Schools receiving provincial funding should have to account to the province regarding record-keeping, teaching standards and the content of the educational program. The province will thus be able to safeguard the integrity of its expenditures in accordance with public policy objectives.

The current system, it must be emphasized yet again, is unjust to those families who effectively pay a double tax to educate their children. But why, in our proudly multicultural country, when the issue is fairness, should political courage be its prerequisite?

25 years ago in The CJN

• Following the release of Iosif Mendelevich, hundreds of his fellow Jewish Refuseniks in major cities across the Soviet Union were reportedly lining up day and night for exit visas.

• Canadian Jewish Congress sent Prince Charles and Lady Diana Spencer a message congratulating them on their engagement.

Troy – from the right

It certainly is impossible to argue with the sentiment of Gil Troy's column "Left and right must rein in the extremists" (CJN, Feb. 16), for indeed the time has come "to seek social consensus… debate with integrity… rather than discourse that demonizes fellow Jews." In making the point, though, he has made a number of statements that, sadly, further vilify "the settlers."

They are continually portrayed as extremist, hotheaded, unlawful and, of course, violent. In truth, it was always the "right-wing nuts" who refused to take up arms against their fellow Jews. It was the Irgun and Stern Gang (Lechi) that were turned in to the British and shot at by their left-wing fellow Jews, not the other way around.

It was a left-wing columnist for Ha'aretz who, during the Gaza withdrawal, urged his readers to hit the road and confront anti-withdrawal protesters with tire irons or other equally effective tools. Oddly, there were no repercussions in the Israeli media over this clearly hateful and violence-promoting article. Nor did the media have much to say when buses full of anti-withdrawal demonstrators never even got rolling because the police got on the buses and confiscated the bus drivers' licences. Not a peep about freedom of speech or civil rights.

Then, as now, the Israeli media by and large had no problem with having rights trampled on, as long as it was done to those pesky settlers. Even Troy, who clearly agrees the settlers were the victims of police violence, implies that they brought it on themselves. "Both sides behaved abominably," he wrote.

I agree whole-heartedly that references to Nazism among Jews must stop. It's ugly and hateful. But I respectfully disagree with Troy's assertion that the people peacefully protesting in Amona were somehow responsible for the actions of the Israeli riot police, that it was settlers tolerating "a culture of lawlessness and treasonous rhetoric" that triggered this violence. This is not so. Very few police were injured. Most of the 200 injured, some of them quite seriously, were demonstrators. These people, all unarmed and non-violent, included many middle-aged and elderly. They included rabbis, cabinet members, Knesset members and even Brig.-Gen. Effi Eitam. Were there a few hooligans? Yes, by most accounts, there were some. Most were not. Yet, they were clubbed to the ground, the young and the old, with no prior discussion or warning.

Someone gave the order that day to crack heads, which was the plan. How could Jews do this to fellow Jews? I believe what made that order even possible is the ongoing smear campaign that is being directed against the settlers, a large segment of Israelis who still believe in Zionism and are not prepared to move into the Post-Zionist era. That does not make them criminals. When all sides are treated equally by the Israeli media and the courts, real communication and healing will finally be possible.

Gil Troy's interpretation of the battle to remove illegal settlers from Amona as a clash between "left" and "right" is well off the mark. There were no Israeli leftists directly involved. Amona was a clash between erstwhile allies on the right, unless acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz underwent a conversion experience.

On the left, neither Labor leader Amir Peretz nor Meretz chief Yossi Beilen was at Amona. Peace Now did initiate the legal action to remove the illegal outpost, but that was done within a normal democratic framework. The only extremists were the lawbreakers who forcefully resisted the legally constituted authorities. However, I am not prepared to say that the police and Israel Defence Forces were without fault, until we see the results of an impartial investigation.

Troy's plea that we should not "demonize fellow Jews" amounts to a defence of those who established an illegal outpost, ignored a court order to vacate it and then violently resisted the legally constituted authorities who attempted to remove them. Israeli lawbreakers do not deserve our sympathy or understanding.

Amona was a clash between the far right and the pragmatic right. The "left" resorted not to violence but to legal action against the extremists.

'There is a better way to fight denial'

By DEBORAH LIPSTADT
JTA

David Irving's arrest and three-year jail sentence for having denied the Holocaust has been met with a chorus of cheers in the Jewish community.

A notorious liar, he was once considered a prominent historian. Many people were delighted that prison would now house a man who has called Jews cockroaches, believes black newscasters should be relegated to reading news of criminals and drug busts, and asked a survivor how much money she had made from having a number tattooed on her arm.

At long last, justice seemed to prevail. In the immediate aftermath of the verdict, my blog (Lipstadt.blogspot.com) was flooded with expressions of delight. Most people assumed I was dancing the horah.

But I was not.

I fought this man's libel charge against me for six years. For more than three months I had to silently sit in court in London listening to him say the most horrible things about Jews, people of colour and survivors. He made fun of those who talked about gas chambers and sneered at survivors' accounts of what they endured. He was full of bluster about how he was going to demolish the myth of the Holocaust.

Quietly and meticulously, relying on the stellar work of a dream team of historians, we showed that every one – not many, not most, but all – of Irving's claims were complete rot. They were based on lies, distortions and fabrications. They were, as the prominent historian Richard Evans and the leader of our research team, said, "A tissue of lies."

Deborah Lipstadt

Some people have argued that since he has written more than 30 books on historical topics, he is a historian. If I wrote books on building bridges that would not make me a structural engineer. Irving has been dubbed by some people on the Internet as a "distorian."

During my trial, Irving kept trying to introduce evidence of a world Jewish cabal or global conspiracy against him. He described me as "the gold-tipped spearhead of the enemies of truth," his euphemism for the Jews.

He laughed at survivors, declaring them liars or psychopaths. And he called the judge – in a very telling slip, "Mein Fuhrer."

He suffered an overwhelming loss. When the judge, in a 350-page judgment, said he "perverts," "distorts," "lies," and that his conclusions are a "travesty," Irving's reputation was left in tatters. When two different courts of appeal concurred, he faced financial ruin.

Why then was I not delighted with the court sentence handed down in Vienna on Feb. 20? I am writing this sifting in the shadow of the Vatican, preparing to teach a course on the Holocaust at the Pontifical Gregorian University, the Jesuit university affiliated with the Vatican. For centuries the church censored Jewish books, forcing Jews to remove anything the church authorities deemed objectionable to Christianity. Even prayers were censored.

We Jews, who have suffered from censorship, should not be supporting it. Moreover, I don't believe censorship is efficacious. It renders the censored item into forbidden fruit, making it more appealing, not less so.

In Europe, as in many quarters in the United States, this discussion has been joined with the debate over the Danish cartoons. Various Jewish organizations have pointed out – and rightfully so – that the Islamic world, which is so vigorously protesting the insult they perceive in these cartoons, is ignoring its own double standard. It has lived quite comfortably for many years with a spate of anti-Semitic cartoons. Some are well nigh pornographic and worthy of what one might find in Der Sturmer, the Nazi anti-Semitic newspaper.

While it is legitimate to argue that there is a difference between cartoons and the murder of millions of people, it is hard to argue for laws against Holocaust denial but demand that the Danish cartoonists' freedom of speech be protected. It suggests a double standard.

More importantly, there is a far better way to fight Holocaust denial than to rely on the transitory force of law. When Irving forced me to go to court to defend my freedom of expression, my most important weapon was the historical truth. We have truth and history on our side. From both an ideological and strategic perspective, those are far more powerful weapons than laws, especially laws that seem to counter the ideal of freedom of expression.

The best way to counter Holocaust deniers is to teach as many people as possible this history. That is why courses on history of the Holocaust have proven so popular and important. Students who take those courses will never fall prey to the David Irving-like distortions.

Jewish tradition teaches that the word emet, truth, composed as it is from the first, middle and last letters of the Hebrew alphabet, encompasses everything. The truth of the Holocaust is terrible and painful, but it is the truth, and that is the most potent weapon anyone could want.

Holocaust denier's sentence spurs debate

By RUTH ELLEN GRUBER
JTA

ROME — Holocaust scholar Deborah Lipstadt was once sued by David Irving, but that doesn't mean she supports the jail sentence given to the Holocaust denier last week.

"I'm in principle against laws that promote censorship. I'm in principle against laws on Holocaust denial.

"I'm in principle against laws that prevent the publishing of cartoons in Denmark," Lipstadt, a professor of Jewish and Holocaust studies at Emory University in Atlanta, told JTA on Tuesday, a day after an Austrian court sentenced Irving to three years in prison for statements he made in 1989 saying there were no gas chambers at Auschwitz.

Lipstadt said, however, that she understands the need for laws on Holocaust denial in countries such as Germany and Austria, given their records during World War II.

The sentence sent a potent message to both local extremists and the international community.

But it also added fuel to freedom-of-speech debates sparked by recent violent protests against Danish cartoons of the Islamic Prophet Muhammad.

Irving, 67, was arrested in November, when he entered Austria to give a lecture at a far-right student fraternity.

Irving's lawyer, Elmar Kresbach, lodged an immediate appeal after the sentence was announced. He told reporters the sentence had been meant as a political warning.

"Irving had expected certain strictness by the court because he was a very well-known case," he said. "But the sentence was too harsh. It became a bit of a message trial and the message was too strong."

Austrian prosecutors on the case want Irving to spend more time in jail. The prosecutors appealed, saying that his sentence of three years is too lenient, given Irving's importance to right-wing extremists.

Irving, who faced up to 10 years in jail, had pleaded guilty to the charges. But he also had said he had changed some of his views and now believed that the gas chambers had existed and that "millions of Jews died."

David Irving

"I was wrong. I recognize my guilt," he told the court, in fluent German. "I have changed my ideas since 1989. History and historic research are like a tree in constant growth."

Judge Peter Liebetreu was not convinced. "The court did not consider the defendant to have genuinely changed his mind," he said after pronouncing the sentence. "The regret he showed was considered to be mere lip service to the law."

Lipstadt was not alone among Jewish observers in expressing concern over the latest chapter in Irving's well-publicized effort to deny the Holocaust.

"The sentence against Irving confirms that he and his views are discredited, but as a general rule I don't think that this is the way this should be dealt with," Antony Lerman, director of the London-based Institute for Jewish Policy Research, told JTA. "It is better to combat denial by education and using good speech to drive out bad speech.

"Freedom of expression is important," he said. "Once you start legislating about history, it could lead to a rocky road."

Other Jewish groups, however, praised the verdict.

"The sentence confirms David Irving as a bigot and an anti-Semite and also serves a direct challenge to the Iranian regime's embrace of Holocaust denial," Rabbi Abraham Cooper of the Simon Wiesenthal Center said in a statement.

Amos Luzzatto, president of the Union of Italian Jewish Communities, welcomed the verdict for both the message it sent to local extremists and to the international community in the wake of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's declarations that the Holocaust is a myth.

"Even more than the conviction, it was fundamental to remove Irving's audience," he said. "An Irving appreciated by supporters of the Iranian president gains strength and listeners. On the other hand, an Irving whom no one pays attention to is finished."

Irving looked shocked when the verdict was announced. "Of course, it's a question of freedom of speech," he said. "The law is an ass."

Austria was part of the Third Reich during World War II, and the country only began to come to terms with its Nazi past in the late 1980s, after it came to light that former president Kurt Waldheim had lied about his World War II activities as a soldier in the German army.

The country, which currently holds the presidency of the European Union, is one of 11 countries that have laws making Holocaust denial a criminal offense.

The Austrian law subjects to prosecution anyone who "denies, grossly plays down, approves or tries to excuse the National Socialist genocide or other National Socialist crimes against humanity in a print publication, in broadcast or other media."

In the weeks before Irving's trial took place, violent protests over cartoons depicting Muhammad ignited debates over the limits of free expression and led some to question the validity of legislating what one could say about the Holocaust.

"I don't think there's a parallel between this and the cartoon, but in the eyes of the general public that thinks about issues of free speech, it's an understandable connection," Lipstadt said.

Britain and the United States have no laws on Holocaust denial.

Both the Wiesenthal Center and the Anti-Defamation League acknowledged the dilemma in their statements.

"While Irving's rants would not have led to legal action in the United States, it is important that we recognize and respect Austria's commitment to fighting Holocaust denial, the most odious form of hatred, as part of its historic responsibility to its Nazi past," Cooper of the Wiesenthal Center said.

This was not the first time Irving had tangled with the law for his views.

In 1992, a German court fined Irving for having publicly declared that there were no gas chambers at Auschwitz. He was barred from entering Germany and several other countries.

In 2000, he lost a highly publicized libel lawsuit in London against Lipstadt and her publisher, Penguin Books, after Lipstadt called him a Holocaust denier in her 1994 book Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory.

That victory, perhaps, helps support her conviction that books, and not laws, are what should fuel the fight against denying the Holocaust.

"We don't need laws to fight Holocaust deniers. We've got history on our side," she said.

Fasting and feasting on Purim

Fasting and feasting are two sides of the same coin. Both the abstention from food and the indulgence in it use our nutritional patterns to mark specific events. Although radically different in experience (especially for our stomachs), the similarities are unmistakable.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Humans must eat, but we can't eat continuously. Overeating and constant denial have disastrous effects on our survival and development. Those are the biological realities of our lives. But we add significance to these base facts by using food to serve other human needs: those of meaning and celebration.

All known cultures have distinctive foodways: particular patterns of eating, diverse menus and recipes, preferred and disdained foods, and specific rules for table culture. We use food to welcome people and comfort them, to celebrate and mourn. Individuals, too, have their own ideas about, and styles of, eating. All of which goes to indicate that we add both cultural and personal layers to our basic biological drives.

Religions use food feasts to aid in the observance of key events. Eating in family or communal venues establishes a sense of community by bringing like-minded people together. We celebrate through and with our foodways.

While feasting is certainly more fun, fasting also helps us locate central moments and focus our attention. Perhaps this explains why Queen Esther demands that the community fast with her as she prepares to approach the King to subvert Haman's evil decree. As on Yom Kippur, fasting is a form of prayer. Abstaining from food enables concentration and supplication while also establishing an aura of piety. Removing food makes us aware of our humanity, of our needs and dependencies, thereby creating room for thought and reflection. So Esther relies on these characteristics, linking herself with the community she is about to represent. By fasting, they take responsibility, too.

The day before Purim is the Fast of Esther. On it, we abstain from food in memory of Esther's unique form of prayer and preparation. This year, I call on all of us to fast for one additional cause: agunot, Jewish women who are denied divorces. For many years, some of us in Montreal have held silent vigils on the fast of Esther to address the silence of the community on the prevalent problems with Jewish divorce. If Esther called on the community to join her, we do too. If she used the fast to demand that they take responsibility, we do too. This is not just the problem of individual women, left alone, abandoned. It's a communal problem that requires communal commitment.

Let's dedicate Shabbat Zachor to domestic violence and the Fast of Esther to agunot, those who suffer from get abuse – the Jewish community's unique form of domestic violence.

Looking for a rabbi

I'm writing this column on Valentine's Day, and it occurs to me that looking for a new congregational rabbi is a lot like looking for a new love. It has all the tension and anxiety of a first date.

I mean no disrespect – I am referring to caritas, the kind of charitable, platonic love that is defined as a deep, warm, caring response to another.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

As my congregation grapples with this challenge, we ask ourselves what kind of a person we want to stand before us every week as we worship, to rejoice with us at simchahs, comfort us when we mourn, and hold our hands when we are ill. Someone who will be both teacher and counsellor, someone who will open to us the beauty of Judaism's history, culture and ethics, while guiding us in a deeper understanding of halachah and minhag (religious custom).

Every congregation is looking for a rabbi who will always be in the office when congregants call, is at every simchah and shivah, spends every day visiting the sick and seniors, is a hit with teenagers, never needs a day off, looks good at interfaith dinners, plays well on local TV, teaches in the Hebrew school while developing profound insights that become part of every weekly sermon… in other words, walks on water.

That such a person does not exist has never decreased the demand for one. In Stephen Fried's book, The New Rabbi, he puts it like this:

"Congregations all want to hire the same rabbi. They all want someone who attends every meeting and is at his desk working until midnight; someone who is 28 years old but has preached for 30 years; someone who has a burning desire to work with teenagers but spends all his time with senior citizens; basically, someone who does everything well and will stay with the congregation forever."

That is no doubt why there is a prayer in our siddur for the leaders of the community, and why in Pirkei Avot, community service is a matter of ethics, not a search for reward. And they did not even have congregations to satisfy!

Rabban Gamliel, son of Rabbi Yehudah ha-Nasi (Judah the Prince, head of the academy and putative redactor of the Mishnah) taught: "Let all who occupy themselves with [the affairs of] the community do so only for the sake of heaven; for the merit of their fathers will sustain them, and their devotion to duty, too, will endure forever."

Now, lest congregational boards misread this, we do not expect our rabbinical leaders to work without pay. Indeed, the duties of a congregational rabbi today would astound, if not horrify, the rabbis of the Talmud. Everything to everyone? Impossible. After all, we as congregants have responsibilities as well, and sometimes we forget this essential fact of congregational life.

We have a responsibility to work at making our synagogues warm, caring places of fellowship, where members can count on support in times of personal stress, illness or bereavement. This means we will take time from our lives to visit the sick, comfort the mourners and welcome newcomers. The rabbi can't do it all.

We should make learning a life commitment. Maybe we could study Jewish history (I wish!). Maybe parshat hashavuah – a rabbinical favourite. Adult ed? You bet.

We should support the youth groups with money, and of course, wheedle our kids into attending.

This is not a sermon on how to be Jewish, but it is a meditation on being the best congregational members we can be. Our own synagogue spent a great deal of time on what we expected from ourselves as a congregation, and then, only then, could we define what we were seeking from a rabbi.

As the prayer puts it, "Bless those who consecrate synagogues for prayer and who come to them to pray, those who provide light for them, wine for blessing the coming and going of Shabbat, food for wayfarers and charity for the poor. May He bless all those who faithfully concern themselves with communal needs… [and] forgiving any wrongdoing, may He send to them and to all Israel blessing and success in the work of their hands."

Freedom of expression and the Danish cartoons

Much has been written about the controversy surrounding the September 2005 Danish reprinting of cartoons depicting the Prophet Muhammad in an alleged disrespectful manner.

In response to these cartoons, Muslim communities have reacted in threatening, violent and destructive displays around the world. There have been boycotts of goods exported from countries where these cartoons have been reprinted. In an illogical reaction, a leading Iranian newspaper encouraged publication of the most offensive cartoons mocking the memory of the Holocaust. Danish embassies have been attacked and, recently, a Muslim cleric in Pakistan offered a reward of more $1 million (US) to anyone who kills the Danish cartoonists responsible for the original drawings.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Newspapers and magazines around the world have subsequently reprinted these cartoons, including publications in Canada. A University of Prince Edward Island student newspaper and a Dalhousie University professor have insisted on the public display of some of the cartoons that have caused the recent furor.

In all cases, the media is quick to justify their actions by citing the importance of the related notions of freedom of the press and freedom of expression.

To be sure, freedom of expression is a vital concept in any truly free and democratic society. It is enshrined in our Constitution as part of Section 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Arguably, however, freedom of expression can sometimes be used as a shield to justify any expression, however malevolent and/or dangerous.

To refer to an old adage, freedom of speech does not justify shouting "fire" in a crowded theatre. Moreover, the various rights contained in the Charter, including freedom of expression, are not absolutes. These rights can be breached by a law if that law is regarded as a reasonable limitation on the exercise of that right.

Since 1982, there have been many instances where laws have been challenged as constituting a violation of freedom of expression. The courts have held some of these laws to be reasonable limitations on freedom of expression, therefore justifying the violation. Whereas, in other cases, they were not held to be reasonable limitations, with the result that the court has struck down these law.

The various laws challenged have ranged from restrictions on tobacco advertising to laws prohibiting the sale of obscene materials. Even Prime Minister Stephen Harper, when he was the chief executive officer of the National Citizens' Coalition, challenged a federal law restricting third party advertising during the course of an election campaign.

Of more immediate concern to the Canadian Jewish community, there have been challenges to laws prohibiting the propagation of hate against identifiable groups (as challenged by James Keegstra) and to laws prohibiting the spreading of false news (as challenged by Ernst Zundel).

Some of these challenges have been successful and others have not.

It has been suggested that the courts will justify restrictions on the offending expression if it can be demonstrated that the expression causes potential harm to vulnerable persons in society.

Returning to the Danish cartoons, many of those insisting on a reprint have invoked freedom of expression as their justification. Our political leaders have also made similar observations. For example, the prime minister has said, while regretting the reprinting of the cartoons, Canadians have the right to free speech. Similarly, Foreign Minister Peter MacKay, while condemning the violent protests around the world, is quoted as saying that "freedom of expression is a legally enshrined principle in Canada but it must be exercised responsibly."

Freedom of expression is, indeed, a constitutionally protected right.

But it is a thin justification when the real motive behind the reprinting may be a desire to commercially exploit the controversy, fan the flames of an already explosive situation or simply grab public attention. Besides, these are older cartoons that are easily available on the Internet for anyone who wishes to see what the furor is all about.

Unlike many local Muslim communities, which have had measured responses to these publications, the governments of Syria and Iran are using this prolonged controversy to incite a worldwide reaction against the West and western values.

In Canada, are we automatically elevating every journalistic decision to reprint the cartoons to the level of defending freedom of expression?

To do so in every instance is disparaging to the concept of free expression, an otherwise essential feature of our democratic society.

The Kirshner File

The French politician with the Nazi tattoo

There is no other political figure in Europe quite like Simone Veil. One of the first female cabinet ministers in France, and the past president of the European parliament, she is a Holocaust survivor whose left arm is tattooed with the telltale blue numerals of a former concentration camp inmate.

Sheldon Kirshner in Paris

When I asked to see the tattoo she received in Auschwitz-Birkenau – where she arrived in April 1944 along with her mother and older sister Madeleine – she rolled up her sleeve and, in a monotone voice, said, "7860051." Pausing momentarily she mused, "It's a number I will never forget."

Virtually the sole member of her family to survive the horrors of the war, Veil, 75, was profoundly affected by her experiences. When she assumed the presidency of the European Parliament in 1979 for a three-year stint, she declared, "I am placing my hope in Europe, in a Europe that has overcome hatred and barbarism to commit itself to achieving peace and solidarity between the peoples of Europe."

European unity is still her pet cause. "I'm a European activist," said Veil, now a member of the Constitutional Council of France, which vets laws to ensure that they are constitutionally sound. "Without a European parliament, we may have had more conflicts. But we have to remain vigilant."

Veil, who spoke in a melange of French and English, was making a veiled reference to the spate of violent anti-Semitic incidents that have wracked France since the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising in September 2000. France, she said, has adopted "very drastic" measures to deal with this phenomenon. "Everyone is grateful to the government for what it has done. Jews in France have a future. You find them in all sectors of society. My grandchildren go to school in Paris, and they have no problems at all."

She believes that the threat to Jews comes not from the far right but from the extreme left and supporters of the Palestinians. "I am very nervous and worried about this," she noted, saying she is also concerned about the pro-Palestinian stance of French Jewish intellectuals. Endorsing the consensus of Jewish community organizations, Veil suggested that young men of Arab origin have largely been the perpetrators of these anti-Semitic acts. But she added that French Muslims are far more often the victims of racial discrimination than Jews.

When I asked whether her political career has ever been affected by anti-Semitism, she replied that the far right attacked her when, as minister of health from 1974 to 1979, she legalized abortion and made access to contraception devices easier. (From 1993 to 1995, she served as minister of social affairs). "It was a difficult moment, very difficult," said Veil, who was interviewed in her office near the busy St. Lazare train station.

Her reputation was hardly tarnished by that episode. "I'm the most popular politician in France," she said, dispensing with modesty. Dominique Moisi, a political commentator who knows her, observed that Veil is widely respected for her honesty, competence and humane approach.

Veil studied law and political science before joining the ministry of justice as a civil servant in 1957 and moving up in the ranks as an advisor and magistrate. While at the ministry, Veil was instrumental in improving living conditions for prisoners and granting illegitimate children equal rights. Valéry Giscard d'Estaing, the French president from 1974 to 1981, noticed her and offered Veil a cabinet job as health minister.

"D'Estaing wanted women in government," said Moisi. "She hadn't been involved in politics, but her husband had been active in centre-right politics. She got into politics almost by accident."

Veil, who has three children, 12 grandchildren and four great-grandchildren, was born in Nice on July 13, 1927 as Simone Jacob. To the best of her knowledge, her family arrived in France prior to the 1789 revolution.

Veil's father, Andre, was an architect who was banned from working in 1941 under Vichy France's anti-Jewish laws. Five months before France was liberated from the Nazi yoke, she and her older sister and their mother were deported to Auschwitz-Birkenau.

Her father and 19-year-old brother, Jean, were sent to a Nazi camp in Kaunas, Lithuania, where they perished. "We don't know why they were deported there." Some years ago, Veil visited Kaunas in an attempt to learn more about their last days. She discovered that they were transported to Lithuania on a convoy of 800 Jews, of whom only 15 survived.

Veil's recollections of Auschwitz-Birkenau are clear. "For the first 48 hours, it was impossible to believe what was going on. There was a lot of bullying and shouting. The people who arrived with us were gassed."

Asked how she managed to survive, she said, "It was a matter of age. I was young and strong. I had this will to live. I dug ditches and carried stones. I was always in the company of my mother and sister."

A Polish kapo, a woman who was hanged by the British after the war as a Nazi collaborator, saved them from certain death. "She told me, 'You're too beautiful to die here. I want to do something for you.'"

Simone Veil

To this day, she vividly remembers the suffering, the exhaustion, the hunger and the cold she endured. But what really haunts her is her memory of the doomed Hungarian Jews who were abruptly separated on arrival and immediately dispatched to the gas chambers. "We were the horrified witnesses," said Veil.

Before the Red Army liberated Auschwitz-Birkenau in January 1945, the Veils were marched 70 kilometres in the snow to Bergen-Belsen. There, amid ghastly conditions, her mother succumbed to typhus, a disease that affected her, too.

In April of that year, Veil was finally freed by the British army. "We uttered no cries of joy. There was only silence, then tears of emotion and sadness. We dared not believe, even at the very end, that our executioners had not succeeded in killing us to erase all trace of their crime."

Shortly after being liberated, she married Antoine Veil, an economist. But in 1953, she was devastated by the deaths of her sister a psychologist – and her 15-month-old son in a car accident. "For me, this was even worse than the death of my mother," she said, her eyes misting over, her voice growing weak. "My sister was happy with this child. It was terrible. We were very close."

Veil – who holds honorary degrees from the Weizmann Institute, Bar-Ilan University and Hebrew University – heads the Foundation for the Memory of the Shoah, which was established by the government in 1999 and is now one of the largest charitable organizations in France.

Capitalized by funds expropriated from French Jews murdered during the war, its mandate is to disseminate information about the Holocaust, encourage and fund research on it and raise awareness of racial prejudice.

There was a time, after the war, when she could not have imagined that French Holocaust deniers such as Robert Faurisson would exist. But today, Faurisson and his cockeyed theories are of no real concern to her. "He has little impact and no influence. It's just propaganda."

Canadians meet leaders of South Africa's Jewish community

Mission participants discover country's Jewish roots

By CARLA LANCIT
UJA Federation

The elephant was clearly agitated. It was flopping its ears back and forth, and steadily walking towards the open-air truck. The truck's wheels spun in the mud, and even the guide was starting to look concerned.

It was a thrilling moment, and, for Liora Yakubowicz, it was a highlight of the trip. "You have to remember that even though you feel safe, you're still in the wild and they're in control," she says.

Yakubowicz and her husband, Simon, were the Toronto chairs of the trip. Together with Montreal chairs Stanley and Barbara Plotnick, they led 30 Torontonians and another 30 Canadians from Vancouver, Montreal, Hamilton and Ottawa on the mission, which was under the auspices of UIA Federations Canada and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

"There's a real feeling of friendship because all the people on the trip are involved in Federation or UIA," says Simon Yakubowicz. "It's not like going with strangers."

In Johannesburg, a world apart from the elephants and lions of the Sabi Sabi Game Reserve, the mission participants met with members of the South African Jewish community, where they discussed issues of mutual concern. In Capetown they met with Jewish community leadership and visited sites, such as the Jewish Museum, which traces the story of South African Jewry, and the Holocaust Centre.

Among the issues discussed was South Africa's endemic crime and poverty. "Their life is difficult," says Liora Yakubowicz. "They're living with circumstances I wouldn't want to be living with."

"The community's got its own challenges," says Simon Yakubowicz, pointing to serious security problems and a high rate of emigration.

He notes, however, that the exodus from South Africa has created a more cohesive community. "Because of the size, more of the community is involved in communal programs than they are here. Here there's a big part of the community that's not involved."

Among the community leaders with whom the mission participants spoke were Helen Suzman, a long-time anti-apartheid activist, and Mendel Kaplan, honorary president of Keren Hayesod and former national chairman of the South Africa's United Israel Appeal.

"My impression was of a most beautiful country," says Carol Kassel, vice president, Planned Giving and Endowments at UJA Federation. "Our South African counterparts live a rich Jewish life, with almost 90% of all children enrolled in Jewish day schools."

"They put on a fantastic trip," says Liora Yakubowicz. "First rate, first class, with top accommodations and terrific guides." And, to top it off, there's "always a Jewish context, which is fantastic."

Something to CHAT about

A formal signing recently took place for the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto to manage the assets of CHAT's (Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto) Legacy Endowment Fund.

"This outstanding partnership between CHAT and the Jewish Foundation will guarantee that the CHAT Legacy Endowment Fund will be managed in the most fiscally responsible way possible and because of the expertise of the Foundation's Investment Committee, the funds will achieve a far greater return than CHAT could have offered," said Alan Applebaum, CHAT president.

"CHAT is very excited about this partnership," said CHAT chair Lori Disenhouse. "It is recognition that we have the same goals and this will be the best way for CHAT to realize its objective of making the Jewish high school experience accessible to the maximum number of Jewish young people in the GTA."

By ELLEN SCHEINBERG
UJA Federation

Do you have family treasures in your home such as kiddush cups, old Rosh Hashana cards, war letters, family diaries or a menorah that belonged to your bubbie? Are you curious about the origins of the item, how it was used, as well as its potential value?

On May 7 from 9:30 a.m. to 5:00 p.m. you'll have the opportunity to get your questions answered at The Beth Tzedec Museum where UJA Federation's Ontario Jewish Archives (OJA), part of the Latner Centre for Jewish Knowledge and Heritage, is co-hosting the Toronto Jewish Road Show.

The road show will include an illustrated keynote address by New York author and Judaic expert Jonathan Greenstein; several workshops on the preservation and care of photographs, textual records and collection of Judaica and finally, an afternoon involving the evaluation of Jewish family treasures and heirlooms by local and international experts. The services of translators will also be available to reveal the content of documents written in Yiddish, Hebrew or Polish.

Brooky Robins, chair of the OJA, sees this event as an opportunity to teach the community about preserving the past and developing a better understanding of family heirlooms.

"Members of the community can bring in their family treasures and learn about the objects, photographs or documents that they cherish," she says. "Family treasures help us learn that we all have a place in history."

For more information or to pre-register before April 28th, contact Dorion Liebgott at 416-781-3514 ext. 32 or the OJA at 416 635 2883 ext. 170

Joseph Lebovic provides Hungarian young people with trip of a lifetime

Philanthropist sponsors 40 on birthright israel experience

By CARLA LANCIT
UJA Federation

Canadian philanthropist Joseph Lebovic has given 40 young Hungarian Jews a number of gifts: a trip to Israel, pride in their heritage, and a sympathetic ear.

The Hungarians—who range in age from 18 to 26—were participants on a recent birthright israel trip sponsored by Lebovic.

The structured 10-day Israel Experience Toronto tour included visits to the Negev, Massada, Ein Gedi and Jerusalem. While in Israel they learned about topics related to Zionism, Judaism, the State of Israel and the land of Israel.

Lebovic chose to sponsor the group because he lived in Hungary during the war. "I know where they come from," he says. Lebovic says that it is important to instill Jewish pride in Eastern European youth, many of whom don't even have the confidence to tell their friends that they're Jewish.

With minimal Jewish education, and parents and grandparents who avoid talking about the Holocaust, the needs of these Jewish young people are different from those of their North American counterparts. "We have to create a program that caters to Eastern European participants," Lebovic says.

More than 98,000 students from 45 countries have participated in birthright israel trips since the project's establishment five years ago, and of the 17,000 Canadian participants, 13,000 have been from the Greater Toronto Area. The trips, at no cost to participants, create a connection between young Jews and the State of Israel and strengthen their Jewish identity.

Toronto philanthropist Joseph Lebovic spends some time in Israel with the group of 40 Hungarians he sponsored on birthright israel.

Lebovic spent three days with the Hungarian group, trying to instill pride in their Jewish heritage. "They see it isn't just money, but somebody taking an interest," he says. "They feel proud that somebody took the time to talk to them."

This trip is just one example of Lebovic's commitment to the Jewish community. He and his brother Wolf are the lead donors behind the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus—a 50-acre site being built in Vaughan by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and its Tomorrow Campaign, chaired by Gerald Schwartz and Lawrence Tanenbaum. The campus will house schools, community services, and fitness and conference facilities.

As for birthright israel, Lebovic says it's money well spent. "I'm going to do it again. They do feel a lot stronger about being Jewish."

UJA Federation covets the next generation of Jewish leaders

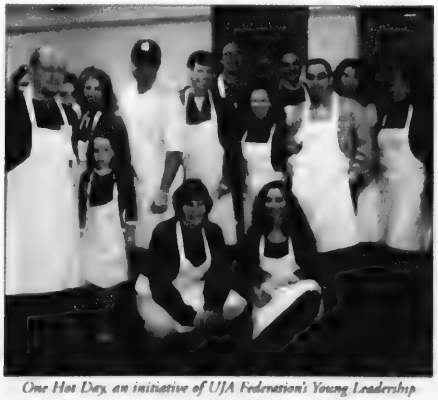
With missions to Israel and Ethiopia, movie nights, and hands-on volunteer opportunities, UJA Federation is targeting a whole new generation of Jewish leaders.

UJA Federation Young Leadership chair Steven Farber notes that a broad range of activities is required to cater to the needs of UJA's young adults—loosely defined as those between 25 and 40. It's a diverse age group that includes recent graduates who are still paying off student loans, single professionals who work long hours, and young parents who are focused on their children's needs.

A number of different divisions within UJA Federation already cater to this age group. "The difficulty is that they exist within a vacuum with very little coordination," says Farber.

To remedy this problem, the groups are in the process of creating a coordinating mechanism through which they will work together. Its primary focus will be communication—each group will know what the others are working on so it can offer support and encourage its members to participate. They will also work together to encourage unaffiliated young adults to get involved. "This whole effort is about having more people in the community become affiliated," says Farber.

The new initiative began informally, as a round table discussion between representatives of different young leadership groups and the main goal is to attract and train the next generation of leaders. When the young leaders "graduate" into general community, they'll take substantial leadership experience with them.



One Hot Day, an initiative of UJA Federation's Young Leadership Division, sees volunteers roll up their sleeves for a number of important community causes, such as this one which helped to feed Toronto's homeless.

Canadians get first-hand look at life of Falas Mura

This is a real manifestation of Zionism.

These words, spoken at the closing caucus, summarize the recent UIA Federations Canada national fact-finding mission to Ethiopia and Israel. Twenty people who participated in the mission, accompanied a group of new Ethiopian olim to Israel.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto – along with other North American Jewish Federations – is financing Operation Promise – which seeks to raise $100 million to bring the remaining Falas Mura to Israel, to absorb the new immigrants, and to help all Ethiopian-Israelis through improved education.

The Falas Mura are former Jews who converted to Christianity under threat or force.

"All of us have undertaken this mission in order to grapple with the most urgent need facing the Jewish community: The Falas Mura in Ethiopia, preparing to finally move to Israel and the Ethiopian Israeli community, struggling to become fully integrated into Israeli society," said Mission Chair Harvey Wolfe.

The group which flew to Ethiopia last month, spent three days witnessing the preparations required for the trip to Israel.

Maxyne Finkelstein of UIA Federations Canada, (second from left), along with Brad Fox and Judith Finer-Freedman meet with a member of the Ethiopian community in Israel.

"We went to the compound in Gondar and saw a school with 2,100 students," said Joey Steiner of Toronto, a past president of UJA Federation. "It was quite an amazing operation. There was a feeding station for children and pregnant and nursing women. It's altogether a tremendously impressive operation for the people waiting to see if they'll qualify to come to Israel. We also went to what used to be a Jewish village and visited the cemetery there where we temporarily affixed a plaque in memory of those who died en route out of the country, and never made it to Israel."

Once in Israel, the mission participants accompanied the new Ethiopian Olim to a welcome reception at the airport, and to the absorption centre in Mevasseret Tzion, between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv.

"While a bit sleep deprived, the group has had an extraordinary opportunity to understand the personal side to this aliyah," said UIA Federations Canada, executive vice president Maxyne Finkelstein. "The mission personalized the plight of these incredibly poor people who are preparing to restart their lives as Jews, dealing with all the complexities of moving into this century."

The message of the Tabernacle

By RABBI YECHIEL GOLDREICH

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

No one will tell you that the structure itself was especially impressive. It was about 120 feet long, 40 feet wide, and 60 feet tall, probably no larger than one of the big, renovated houses we see today.

The people who built it could presumably have made a much bigger "building" if they had wanted to. There was no lack of qualified workmen. Heaven knows that almost everyone had plenty of experience in construction.

But this type of edifice, the Mishkan, the Tabernacle, the portable sanctuary that housed the Holy Ark in the desert, was meant to be different from the more banal jobs the children of Israel were used to doing. It was meant to be a work of art.

The materials were durable but delicate. The Mishkan was also made to be taken apart and, like the community that built it, to be transported from place to place. Made out of exotic lumber and colourful leather, coated with precious metals, it was the collective labour of many poor, hardworking souls.

This was their "synagogue," their House of God, and I'm sure they were proud of it. I'm not clear about what became of the structure, but like other public buildings, it probably fell into disuse when the larger, more permanent building – the Temple – was constructed.

Maybe it seems foolish to get sentimental about a "building," but I truly believe there was magic going on in that place. I don't mean magic only as a metaphor for the special feelings of holidays and celebrations that were observed there, but I believe that truly enchanted experiences often happened there.

I'm not the only one who believes this. The collective childhood memory of our people recalls the extraordinary setting and the voice from deep inside that place.

And so, Jews in synagogues worldwide read the parshiot at the end of Exodus every year, the passages about this sanctuary that our ancestors built as a home for God. Consider the millions of hours spent by people simply studying the furniture, dimensions and method of construction of the Tabernacle.

Religious synagogues still model themselves on this building today, to reconnect to our past and reproduce what we have lost. Like grownups visiting a childhood home, we are certainly not simply surveying the house structure or planning to tear it down to build something else, but trying to re-experience the warmth, simplicity and miracles of our formative years in our present-day lives.

Jewish humour, Part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

A rabbi, seriously ill, was sent the following message from his congregation: "We wish you a speedy recovery, by a vote of 213 to 56." [http://tinyurl.com/7uewk]

Last week, we looked at sites that trace Jewish humour from biblical times to the early 20th century. Today we continue the voyage and focus on American entertainment.

The TV documentary A Gift for Laughter suggests two reasons for the Jewish use of humour. As a survival mechanism ("as a defensive response to the burden of suffering and as a technique for overcoming adversity by sharpening one's wits") and as a people in relation to the dominant society ("many Jewish parents teach their children to learn, to question authority, to explore different points of view"). [http://tinyurl.com/e6eo6] Questioning authority has certainly been a hallmark of many Jewish entertainers, among them Jon Stewart, Lenny Bruce or Minnie Marx's boys. [http://hauntedsmile.com/excerpt.html]

Guests: Hooray for Capt. Spaulding, the African explorer!

Spaulding: Did someone call me schnorrer?

Guests: Hooray, hooray, hooray!

A couple of years ago, PBS radio produced a wonderful radio series in which they lovingly restored incredible Yiddish radio programs from the 1930s to the '50s. One of the stars of the Yiddish Radio Project was C. Israel Lutsky, better known as the Jewish Philosopher. Part Dear Abby, part Dr. Phil, there was no question he felt he could not address. You can listen to a rare English-language broadcast in which he expounds on the Jewish gift for humour. [http://yiddishradioproject.org/gems/23/]

A few decades later, Jeff Berkwits looked at the ubiquity of Jewish humour and asked an interesting question. "What defines Jewish comedy, and have traditional Jewish values, deeply rooted in Judaism's religious and cultural traditions, become so mainstream they no longer qualify as distinctly Jewish?" Comedian Max Alexanders adds, "It's like a bagel. A bagel was once just a Jewish food. Now, they serve bagels at McDonald's with bacon on them." Comedy writer Bruce Vilanch points out that in Seinfeld "even the non-Jewish characters seem to be Jewish, and certainly their parents seem to be Jewish." [http://tinyurl.com/pud5n]

Speaking of Jerry Seinfeld, if you'd like to invite him to liven up a party you're throwing, you'd better speak to Gail Stocker. She represents such stars as Jon Stewart, Roseanne Barr or a couple dozen other Jewish comedians (and many other A-listers.) Unfortunately, her site doesn't say how much they charge. But I guess if you have to ask… well, you know. [http://comedycontact.com/jewishcomics.html]

Trying to compile a comprehensive list of Jewish American comedians is no easy task. Undaunted, the always formidable online encyclopedia Wikipedia has created a section titled List of Jewish American entertainers that runs 31 pages. You'll find veterans like Sid Caesar, Fanny Brice and the Horwitz brothers – Moe, Shemp and Curly Howard, aka the Three Stooges. And more contemporary shticksters including Sandra Bernhard, Gilbert Gottfried and Larry David. (Sensing the inherent pitfalls when trying to create a list of Jews in contemporary society, Wikipedia also provides a link to its article on Who Is a Jew.) [http://tinyurl.com/nv68s]

Jewish comedians – and Jews – are used to being heckled, insulted – and worse. But rarely has the Jewish funny bone been so battered as when British researchers conducted a study to determine the word's funniest joke – without a single Jewish joke among the finalists of the 40,000 surveyed. As veteran comic Alan King told Forward, "There aren't 40,000 gentile jokes. If there are, they've been changed." (You can read the winner on the Forward site, which I must admit is not bad.) [http://tinyurl.com/7at4d]

King believes there really is no such thing as the greatest Jewish joke, although he offered what he called "the greatest priest, minister and rabbi" joke.

"A priest, minister and rabbi go into a bar. The bartender says, 'What is this, a joke?'"

Assessment of World Jewry

Three years ago, the Jewish Agency For Israel established The Jewish People Policy Planning Institute, a think tank based in Jerusalem that brings together scholars, researchers, lay and professional leaders, and public figures of experience and renown from all over the Jewish world. The institute's mandate is to think in present and future terms about the important issues facing the Jewish world and to offer recommendations and strategies for those issues that are implementable.

Among its publications, the institute publishes an Annual Assessment of the state of the Jewish world.

The CJN reproduces here the "Foreword" from the executive report of the assessment for 2005, by former U.S. ambassador to Israel Dennis Ross, chair of the board and professional guiding council of The Jewish People Policy Planning Institute; and a table of "Selected Indicators of World Jewry."

The Jewish People Policy Planning Institute inaugurated an annual assessment of the state of the Jewish People in 2004. Its initial assessment outlined the status of Jewish communities worldwide, including in Israel; described trends that should be a source of concern; and proposed remedies for problem areas. While comprehensive in scope, the 2004 assessment was designed not be replicated each year but to provide a baseline for subsequent comparison.

The 2005 assessment meets that purpose. It updates the geopolitical context in which world Jewry and Israel operate. It highlights critical changes in key communities, focusing on new challenges for French Jewry and the Jews of the former Soviet Union and Poland. It draws attention to trends, particularly demographic trends, that have become more troubling. It reviews how globalization and science and technology can provide new opportunities to promote greater cohesion and education of Jewish people internationally. And, of course, the 2005 JPPPI assessment makes recommendations.

Some of the recommendations are new and others, not surprisingly, build on last year's proposals. The recommendations fall into a number of different categories. One set of recommendations is urgent, responding to the historic decision of the Israeli government to disengage from Gaza and a small part of the West Bank. Taking note of the controversy and the possible trauma over the evacuation of 21 settlements in Gaza and four in the northern part of the West Bank, the assessment calls on Jewish leaders in the Diaspora to make strong declarations against violence, disobedience and violations of law that could be the response to the withdrawal. Similarly, world Jewry is called on to participate in the development of the Negev and the Galilee, both to assist in the absorption of evacuated Jewish settlers and to shift the demographic balance in these areas.

Other categories of recommendations include those on demography, on Diaspora-relations, on Jewish People leadership (enhancing quality and accelerating generational change), on crafting geopolitical grand strategies, and on fully utilizing cyberspace to take advantage of the global nature of the Jewish People. Suffice it to say that many of the recommendations will generate their own controversy, but the demographic trends, among other problems, demand serious responses and those to date have had limited effect. Whether on demography, or affecting generational change in Jewish leadership, or investing in Jewish education, or better integrating the Jewish People as a whole, it is clear that a hard-headed look at priorities is essential.

If nothing else, this year's recommendations should trigger such discussion. However, the measure of the assessment is not the discussion but the actions that result from them. World Jewry and leaders in Israel need to reflect on the recommendations and show how they are responding to them – or at least how their responses are addressing the challenges outlined in the assessment.

Andrea Bronfman memorialized in Montreal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A heartbroken Charles Bronfman tried to keep his composure, but could no longer contain his grief when he introduced one of his late wife Andrea's favourite songs, the light-hearted Baubles, Bangles and Beads.

That song from the Broadway musical Kismet, an exotic fantasy about fate, rendered by Cantor Gideon Zelermyer and the choir, concluded the memorial service for "Andy" held in the majestic sanctuary of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim last week.

She died Jan. 23 shortly after being struck by a vehicle near the Bronfmans' home in Manhattan at age 60. After a funeral in New York, she was buried in Jerusalem on Jan. 27.

About 800 people came to remember a "wee thing," as her late dad, Scotty Morrison, called his diminutive daughter who grew into a "powerful force," in the eyes of her husband, on the world Jewish scene and beyond. It was a moving tribute, thoughtfully organized, but spontaneous in its emotion.

"I was privileged to spend 25 years with Andy… Ours was a very, very special relationship," said Charles, 74, who has made New York his principal residence since 1998.

He promised to carry on the philanthropic causes she worked for. "There will be no fooling around; she left us our marching orders," said Charles, delivering the toughest public speech he has ever made.

He singled out the people of Israel for the kindness they have shown. "So often we hear about the aggressive nature of Israelis, their rudeness and lack of civility. This is total nonsense. I have never experienced such compassion, dignity and love, and not just from the leaders…

"Israel is unfortunately a country all too familiar with tragedy, yet [Andrea's death] struck a profound chord." The couple spent about three months a year at their home in Jerusalem.

The service opened with the Hebrew song A Tale of Honey and Thorns, a reminder, said Rabbi Adam Scheier, of the bittersweet nature of life. Both sides of the bimah's border were banked with masses of ferns and roses of all sizes, in shades of salmon, gold and vermilion. It ended with a contemporary arrangement of K'El Maleh Rachamim.

Relatives and friends drew a portrait of a complex woman who could be uncompromising and sometimes brusque in the pursuit of what she believed in, but warm, funny and loyal to those closest to her.

Other speakers were Charles' son, Stephen Bronfman, and Andrea's children, Jeremy, Pippa and Tony Cohen; Andrea's only sibling, Kappy Flanders, who organized the event; Andrea's friend Dany Pollack; Leo Kolber, Charles' friend of 57 years; McGill University professor Gil Troy; and Supreme Court Justice Rosalie Abella, whose husband Irving wrote the book A Coat of Many Colours, part of a Canadian Jewish history project Andrea initiated.

Stephen said his father is in "immense pain… Only time will heal such a big hole in such a big heart." Theirs was "a love story and a partnership," he said, with Andrea being "the voice of reason that got Dad through tough times. Boy, could you make him smile.

"Rest easy, Andy. We are taking care of Dad, and Dad is taking care of Yoffe," a reference to her beloved dog, which she was walking the morning of the accident.

Flanders said she and her sister, who grew up in England, were raised with Jewish values that taught them "from our earliest days, to love and share with one another, and to be grateful for each other."

Andrea, she said, had the grace and elegance of their Brooklyn-born mother, Doris, and the wit and charm of their father, Hyam, better known as Scotty. Andrea was "a mere 5-foot-2, with a push, but proved that good things really do come in small packages.

"We did not always see eye to eye; we were both strong women with strong opinions, but we deeply loved each other." Their strong bond withstood time and distance, she said, concluding, "For better or for worse, I will never be the same."

Andrea's eldest son, Jeremy, said his mother "was who she was; she didn't sugarcoat things," but he had difficulty continuing when he said she was "just coming into her own as a grandmother," even though she disliked the term.

Pippa said her mother "consistently dazzled and amazed everyone who crossed her path," yet the family knew her as simply their mom who made comfort foods and homey desserts, could sing every song from The Sound of Music and, as Tony recalled, "ate all that revolting blue icing off a Woolworth cake."

She was able to juggle her interests in such a way that the family always felt they came first.

Pollack described her friend as "prickly with anyone she perceived as taking advantage. She had sharp antennae for takers. She was impatient with sycophants and phonies… She was by no means an angel; in fact, she was rather proud of being a brat."

But to those she favoured, she was deeply loyal and generous. She held herself to "high standards of excellence. She did not take life lightly."

As Kolber said, Andrea "knew what she wanted and had a way of getting it. She told you exactly what she was thinking right to your face… It was as if she sensed her time was limited on Earth and had to get things done in a hurry."

Abella also pointed to the contradictions in Andrea's personality and preferences. She was someone who was "both sophisticated and earthy, serious and funny." She could not abide arrogance, cowardice and hypocrisy. "An ordinary challenge was no magnet for her preternatural skills and energy."

She loved the Jewish community for its pride, but not its resignation; and Israel when it was progressive rather than intransigent, Abella said. "But she loved Charles without reservation."

Hamas tones down rhetoric without moderating views

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

What exactly is a Hamas "moderate"?

Ismail Haniyeh, the new Palestinian Authority president, has been described by many journalists as "moderate" or "pragmatist," with little to back up this claim.

In The Democracy Game (New Yorker, Feb. 27) David Remnick investigates whether Hamas can moderate. He casts a skeptical eye at Hamas leaders "fairly schooled in the arts of diplomatic wrangling and media manipulation" whose "public language attempts to yoke contradictory goals."

Remnick writes that Hamas is "trying to enter the realm of politics without relinquishing the prerequisites of armed resistance and the purity of ideological rejectionism. They want to maintain the support of their most radical fighters without losing the funding of the European Union. They hint at the possibility of a hudna – a prolonged truce – if Israel retreats to the borders that existed before the Six Day War, but they also reserve the 'historical' goal of absolute dominion made plain in their charter."

He notes that a media adviser "counselled Hamas candidates not to talk about killing Israelis and to limit their speech about taking back all of historic Palestine." In other words, tone down the Islamic rhetoric that frightens the West.

So by Hamas standards, moderates say less radical things – rather than actually moderating their views and renouncing any of Hamas' radical beliefs.

Those hard-core positions were expressed by Mahmoud al-Zahar, the Hamas leader in Gaza, on Global News, Feb. 18. Reporter Martin Himel presented Zahar saying: "We are not accepting the argument that Israel is our partner or to accept the existence of Israel as a legal state."

On CBC Radio news, Feb. 19, Margaret Evans reported that PA President Mahmoud Abbas "went head-to-head with Hamas publicly, warning them that any Palestinian administration has an obligation to respect existing agreements with Israel."

Abbas could arguably be called a moderate. He has spoken to the Palestinians, in their own language, about the need to reject violence and accept their own state living alongside Israel.

What did Nahlah Ayed mean when on CBC-TV News: Sunday Night, Feb. 19, she said, without explanation, that Haniyeh is considered by some to be a "relative moderate"?

After all, he rejects accommodation with Israel because he rejects the very idea of Israel's presence as a Jewish state. Compared to Abbas, Haniyeh could hardly be called a moderate. But within the extreme rejectionist terms defined by the Hamas charter, he might be considered a "relative" moderate since he has reportedly hinted at the possibility of a long-term truce with Israel. However, the phrase "relative moderate" is misleading and confusing to a general audience that doesn't have a deep understanding of Hamas and certain of its recently finessed public pronouncements.

On CTV National News, Feb. 19, Ellen Pinchuk said that Haniyeh is considered to be a "pragmatist." She quotes him as saying: "I pray to God almighty to help me in keeping up this responsibility in order to clarify the Palestinian issue and the Palestinian people's sacrifices until we regain the rights that were forcibly taken from this great people."

Like the term "moderate," "pragmatist" in this context is not something that is readily comprehensible. For sure, a clear, uncompromising vocabulary is needed to capture the truly immoderate nature of Hamas.

Money now needed for PR campaign, funding advocates say

"Opposition to the EETC can be effectively disarmed by ensuring that the discrimination rationale is central, since nobody credibly defends discrimination," the mailing stated. "It is crucial that both the design and messaging of any initiative to fund independent schools focuses in a very disciplined and visible way on the discrimination issue."

A sample letter-to-the-editor reacting to Tory's statements says it's "hard to see what is controversial" about the remarks.

"It is beyond reasonable debate that funding Catholic schools at 100 per cent while providing nothing to non-Catholic faith-based schools is discrimination," the sample letter says. "Nobody seriously disagrees that funding 93 per cent of faith-based schools at 100 per cent, while excluding the other seven per cent just because they are not Catholic, is wrong."

Walfish said it's time Jewish advocacy organizations and other faith groups considered hiring a professional lobbyist to press the funding case.

Last week, both the Globe and Mail and Toronto Star ran editorials strongly opposing government support for private and faith-based schools, arguing that such a move would drain much-needed money from the public system.

Last Thursday, Parents for Equality in Education Funding again sent out sample letters, this time, as a reply to the editorials.

Remaining Ethiopian Jews face dire conditions

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Harvey Wolfe has returned from a brief trip to Ethiopia shaken by the dire poverty and convinced of the urgency of providing the remaining people of Jewish descent in that country with the resources to live in dignity and bringing as many as possible to Israel.

Wolfe, a Montreal businessman, led a group of 20 Canadian Jewish fundraisers on a mission last month designed to show them the conditions of the Falas Mora, Ethiopians believed to have been Jewish before they were converted to Christianity in the late 19th and early 20th century and who still maintain certain Jewish practices. The group saw the work being done on the ground by principally the Jewish Agency and American-Jewish Joint Distribution Committee.

The Canadians also accompanied 55 olim on their flight to Israel and witnessed their first day in the land they have dreamed of going to for two millennia.

"I was overwhelmed by the poverty and the sadness, not just among the Falas Mora, but among the people generally. It is something I can't get out of my mind, nor can I forget the smells. It's one big sewer," Wolfe said. "Anybody who visits has to want to help."

He was shocked by how primitive the Falas are; few can read and they have no understanding of the modern world, what a refrigerator is or even how to use a toilet.

In September, the Israeli government launched Operation Promise to bring thousands of Falas to Israel, where many have relatives. Wolfe said estimates of their numbers range from 13,000 to 18,000; it is unclear because Jewish Agency officials have to determine the ancestry of each individual, a difficult task when no written records exist and a limited number of people are in Ethiopia to make that assessment. About 300 Falas a month are being flown to Israel.

"The Israeli government may decide to increase this to 600 because the Ethiopian government has set a deadline of December, 2007 [for their emigration], although we heard that may be extended another year," Wolfe said.

Some 3,000 Falas were left behind during Israel's last major airlift of Ethiopians in 1991 because they were not recognized as Jews by Israel's chief rabbinate or even under the more liberal law of return. Since then many more have come forward, leaving their villages and congregating in the capital of Addis Ababa and the provincial centre of Gondor, waiting to be taken to what they believe is literally the Promised Land. Some have been waiting seven or eight years, Wolfe said.

"If I was making the decisions, and if money was not an issue, I would have brought them out as quickly as possible. They see themselves as Jewish, they practise some Judaism… They are a heck of a lot more Jewish than many people I know," said Wolfe, who is the immediate past world chair of the Keren Hayesod board of trustees, and now sits on the executives of that organization and of the Jewish Agency.

But, he acknowledged, the cost of acculturating Ethiopians to living in Israel is high, up to $100,000 (US) per person, he was told.

Israel has earmarked $23 million (US) over three years for the care of the Falas in Ethiopia and for their integration into Israel. This provides food, shelter and health care, as well as education in Judaism and Hebrew, in living in a modern society, and vocational training in preparation for settling them to Israel.

Israel has asked Diaspora Jewry to contribute another $100 million to this task.

Organized by United Israel Appeal-Federations Canada, the mission's itinerary included three days in Ethiopia. Participants were taken to a shantytown, just outside the Sheraton Hotel where they stayed, that has sprung up in Addis. Wolfe described it as consisting of tiny hovels that shelter several people each. For these, they must pay a high proportion of the little money they earn.

They also met with the more fortunate ones who are now living at the Israeli Embassy compound while they are processed for aliyah.

The Canadians then flew to Gondar in the mountains to visit a Jewish Agency compound where children and adults are taught and the children are fed twice a day. The facilities are very basic, Wolfe said, the classroom floors, for example, are bare earth.

Wolfe readily admits he felt uncomfortable as a privileged outsider coming to observe this desperation. Despite their need, he found the Falas a proud people. "They are not looking for a handout. Some of them sell things. If the price is $2 and you hand them $10, they insist on giving you more stuff."

Wolfe was astounded when waiting to depart for Israel, that the olim walked to the airport, carrying suitcases and other belongings on their heads.

None, of course, had ever been on a plane before and they were nervous, Wolfe said.

"The stewardess came around with headsets, and they had no idea what they were. My daughter [Wendy Fine] was sitting between two boys, and showed them how to put them on. When they heard the music, they were overwhelmed; they couldn't figure out where it came from."

The Canadians followed the Ethiopians as they arrived at the airport, where they were immediately given about NIS 300 (about $63 US) each for immediate needs, and then onto an absorption centre, where they settled into small apartments. "We could see they were very much in shock," Wolfe said.

No charges over cartoons

Calgary's chief crown prosecutor won't lay hate promotion charges against two publications that reprinted controversial Danish cartoons depicting the Muslim prophet Muhammad.

Gordon Wong said there is no evidence the Calgary-based Western Standard or the Jewish Free Press intended to promote hatred by publishing the cartoons, the Toronto Star reported.

"The intent was to debate the issues within the articles. That's different than inciting hatred," Wong said.

Last month, both publications reprinted some of the cartoons that have angered Muslims worldwide. One depicts Muhammad in a turban holding a bomb with a lit fuse. In another, he tells suicide bombers there are no virgins left in heaven for them.

Mohamed Elmasry, head of the Canadian Islamic Congress, said Canada's hate laws should be strengthened to include these types of images. The cartoons, he said, imply "that all Muslims, by being a Muslim, also are terrorists. It will endanger the well-being of Muslims in Canada."

Convictions under anti-hate provisions of the Criminal Code can occur only if there is a deliberate intent to promote hate. Comments on subjects in the public interest or on a religious topic are protected.

Meanwhile, the Calgary-based Islamic Supreme Council of Canada (ISCC), which has filed a human rights complaint in Alberta over the cartoons, said it will launch a national Islamic newspaper next month to help Canadians understand issues that are important to Muslims. The move came after the two Calgary publications reprinted the cartoons.

"This will not be a newspaper… of a specific denomination. This will represent the broader Muslim community," ISCC president Syed Soharwardy told CBC. The Muslim Free Press will publish every two weeks in four cities.

Obituary

Carol Wise was CJN's beauty columnist

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Carol Wise, a makeup artist and longtime Canadian Jewish News beauty columnist, died last month after a long battle with cancer. She was 54.

As well as being a makeup artist for more than 30 years, Wise returned to school about five years ago to train as a psychotherapist.

Carol Wise

As part of her psychotherapy practice, she saw residents and families of residents at Lincoln Place Nursing Home, in order to help them deal with various issues, says her son Matthew.

"She loved it. She was a people person, and was happiest when she could help others."

She fought her illness bravely, he says, "and beat odds for a long time because of her strength and will.

"She never complained, and always had a positive outlook. No matter how dark the day, she could always find a bright side."

Francine Birken, Wise's sister-in-law, says she and Wise were more sisters than anything else. "Our bond was unbelievable. We were best friends. Carol was a dynamic, magnificent woman. She healed so many people with her psychotherapy.

"So many people she saw at Lincoln Place couldn't deal with their own loss of independence or with their parents' illnesses. She literally put these people's lives together.

"She also made people feel good in her work as a makeup artist. She made brides feel like they were the most beautiful person on earth."

Wise was a spiritual person who did yoga, ate well, and was very health conscious, says Birken. "She took care of herself as well as others.

"Carol had a real presence about her. She was a striking woman, inside and out."

Roz Mogani called Wise the epitome of grace and elegance.

"When she walked into a room, people noticed her," said Mogani, who was a teenager when she first met Wise.

"She had an ability to connect with people. We would always have wonderful philosophical conversations. She was a sweet soul."

As well as her son and sister-in-law, Wise leaves her mother Belle Birken, daughter Stacey, who is expecting her first child in about one month, son-in-law Jamie Michaels, brother Howard Birken, sister Elayne, and brother-in-law Jack Shuster.

Ed Morgan, a professor of law and president of Canadian Jewish Congress, appeared before Rothstein once on a tax case.

"His general reputation as a jurist is excellent, beyond reproach," Morgan said. "The Federal Court has had a mixed record, but he's one of the jurists who pulled it up."

Morgan, who won his case before Justice Rothstein, described the judge as possessing "a keen analytic mind.

"He's a lawyer's lawyer. It would be right to say he applies the law with the minimum amount of politicization," adding that Rothstein "leans to the conservative side."

Morgan speculated Rothstein's judicial philosophy will lead him to "be a less activist than interventionist judge… He's a very prudent jurist."

Morgan suggested that Abella, named to the court by former prime minister Paul Martin, has a more "interventionist" reputation. "Both have fine legal minds. It should make for highly intellectual debate."

In describing his philosophy behind the appointment of judges, during the recent federal election campaign, Harper said, "When I appoint judges, what we'll be looking for is what I call the judicial temperament, and that is the ability to competently and shrewdly and wisely apply the laws that are passed by the Parliament of Canada."

After naming Rothstein to the High Court, Harper said, "Marshall Rothstein's candidacy was scrutinized by a comprehensive process initiated by the previous government that included members from all the political parties. I believe he has the qualifications necessary to serve Canadians well from the country's highest court."

Later, the prime minister stated: "I am looking forward to watching the ad hoc [parliamentary] committee's work and listening to Mr. Rothstein's answers. This hearing marks an unprecedented step towards the more open and accountable approach to nominations that Canadians deserve."

Rothstein was born on Dec. 25, 1940, and grew up in Winnipeg. He was married in 1966 to Sheila Dorfman of Montreal and they have four children. Dorfman works as a doctor at a walk-in clinic in Ottawa.

Rothstein served as a partner in the prestigious Winnipeg firm of Aikins, MacAulay & Thorvaldson, practising in the areas of administrative law and litigation, primarily in the transportation field. He also served as a labour and commercial arbitrator as well as a member of the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal.

Rothstein lectured in transportation law at the University of Manitoba's faculty of law as well as in contract law.

He was named a judge of the Federal Court in 1992 and was appointed to the court's appeal division in 1999.

Survey looks at students' views on sex

'The results show that campus life is certainly not what it was in our parents' day'

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Five years after Noah Gurza and Jordan Ravka successfully launched an online campus dating service for Canadian students, they thought it might be interesting to poll students on their views on sex through a Canada-wide survey.

"It's important to gauge students on social issues, and we thought it would be a good opportunity to survey students from coast to coast on sex," Gurza said.

But what the two Toronto-based Jewish founders of CampusKiss.com did not expect was the number of students who responded to their CampusKiss and Tell University and College Sex Survey, and what they had to say about their sex lives.

Of 2,684 students polled last month, – 51 per cent female, 49 per cent male – in addition to other responses, 87 per cent said they have virtual sex in the form of instant messenger, web cams or the telephone.

"The results show that campus life is certainly not what it was in our parents' day, when they relied on parties and mutual friends to meet people," said Gurza, a 30-year-old consultant for the provincial government.

"When we started CampusKiss five years ago, we knew that the Internet and technology in general were playing a bigger role in student life… What's surprising about these results is that the Internet is being heavily used in student sex lives as well."

Ninety per cent of students from more than 150 Canadian colleges and universities said their campus supports and promotes safe sex, although 10 per cent admitted to not using any protection.

Another statistic suggested that one in five Canadian male students have had too many partners to count, while one in 10 women said this.

While Gurza said he hoped the survey would offer students a cross-country perspective on campus sex, he admitted that it was also a marketing technique meant to get some publicity for his online dating service.

"The response to this has been amazing. We've been on CNN, NBC, MSNBC, CBC," he said, adding that initially he and Ravka were expecting about 1,000 students would take part in the questionnaire.

"For us, the survey was a tremendous success. We wanted to make [it] fun. It was only 20 questions. It was a short, engaging and fun survey," he said.

Gurza guessed that part of the appeal was that students are generally curious to see if the views and practices of their peers are similar to theirs.

"Students want to know what other students think about sex, if things differ from campus to campus."

He said he hopes to make the survey an annual event.

While this was the first time CampusKiss.com conducted the survey, the dating service has been up and running since 2000.

Gurza was still working on his master's degree from York University in political science when he decided to launch a service he felt was lacking in Canada. He said that at the time, many online dating services existed for students in the United States, but there weren't any Canadian equivalents.

He teamed up with Ravka, a media-shy computer science graduate from McMaster University, whom Gurza calls the brains behind the technology of the site.

"I thought it would be a good idea to channel this into the Canadian landscape."

He also said that while there were dating services for the older crowds, "nothing had been done for this demographic.

"We're targeting 18- to 23-year-olds who grew up with the Internet. Going online is their new, preferred way to meet people, and that activity lends itself to our service, to people who are in the business of online dating."

But the 73,000 users can do more than search for a potential mate, he said. "It's a meeting place for students on campus, whether it's for dating purposes, friendship purposes, or you want to start a club."

Gurza added that their site has 1,700 different clubs, including political, movie and sports clubs, and the site regularly posts 20 monthly events across the country.

"CampusKiss has become a real community of students," he said.

While this site is designed so that students from across the country can connect, many of the users are from big city centres – Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver.

In celebration of the 10th anniversary of Shabbat Across America/Canada on March 3, the National Jewish Outreach Program has give tens of thousands of Jews a "taste" of Shabbat, with some help from world-famous chefs.

A Gourmet Shabbat is a full-colour, glossy publication featuring Friday night customs, blessings and songs, and recipes from chefs such as Susie Fishbein, Jeffrey Nathan, Joan Nathan and Wolfgang Puck.

Shabbat Across America/Canada, which takes place in about 600 locations in the two countries, introduces Jews with limited knowledge and background to the joy and beauty of Sabbath.

Since its inception, more than half a million people have participated.

While specific program details vary from location to location, all participants enjoy an explanatory Friday evening service as well as a festive communal dinner.

For a list of synagogues participating in Shabbat Across America/Canada or to register for a local program, visit www.njop.org or call 1-888-SHABBAT.

GEFILTE FISH
Wolfgang Pack

1 head (about 2½ lb.) green cabbage
2 cups matzah meal
1 qt. fish stock
1 tbsp. olive oil
½ medium onion, minced
2 lb. fish fillets, such as pike, carp or whitefish, cut into chunks
3 eggs, separated
½ cup chopped Italian parsley
2 to 3 tsp. salt
2 tbsp. (6 or 7 sprigs) chopped fresh tarragon leaves
½ tsp. freshly ground white pepper
cayenne pepper to taste
1 medium carrot, peeled and cut into julienne
1 medium leek, white part only, cut into julienne

Preheat the oven to 375. Blanch the head of cabbage in boiling salted water, about 5 minutes, then place in a basin of cold water. Remove the whole leaves and cut away the tough core. As you peel off the outer leaves, you may have to return the head of cabbage to the boiling water to soften the inner leaves. Dry on a clean towel and reserve.

Place the matzah meal in a small bowl. Cover with 1 cup of stock and let soak until needed.

In a small skillet, heat the olive oil. Over medium heat, saute the onion until wilted, 4 to 5 minutes. Do not brown. Cool.

In a wooden bowl or on a chopping board, chop the fish fine with a chopper or large knife. Add the matzah meal with the stock, the cooled onions, the 3 egg yolks, the chopped parsley and tarragon, 2 tsp. of salt, white pepper; and cayenne, and continue to chop until well combined.

In a clean, medium bowl, whisk the egg whites until firm but not stiff. Stir a little into the fish mixture, and then quickly but gently, fold in the remaining whites. To test for flavour, bring a little fish stock to simmer; add a small ball of the fish mixture and cook for about 5 minutes. Taste and correct seasoning.

Heat the remaining fish stock and spoon a little into an 11 x 17-in. baking pan. Divide the fish mixture into 12 portions, about 4 oz. each, and enclose each portion in one or two cabbage leaves. You will find that when the leaves get smaller, you will have to use two leaves to wrap the fish. As each package is formed, place in the prepared baking pan, seam-side down. This size pan holds the 12 packages comfortably. Pour the remaining stock over the fish and top with the julienned carrots and leeks. Cover the pan with foil and bake for 30 minutes. Let cool in the stock and refrigerate until needed. Serves 12.

APPLE CIDER BRISKET
Jeff Nathan

2 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 6-lb. beef brisket, outer fat trimmed
3 large onions, halved lengthwise and thinly sliced into half-moons
3 cups apple cider, as needed
½ cup unsulfured molasses
6 garlic cloves thinly sliced
1 tbsp. chopped fresh rosemary or 1½ tsp. dried rosemary
1 tbsp. chopped fresh thyme or 1½ tsp. dried thyme kosher salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste

Position a rack in the centre of the oven and preheat to 325. Heat the oil in a large Dutch oven or small roasting pan over medium-high heat. Add the brisket and cook, turning once, until browned on both sides, about 8 minutes. Transfer to a plate.

Add the onions to the same pot and cook, stirring occasionally, just until softened, about 5 minutes. Place the brisket on top of the onions, add the cider and molasses, and sprinkle the meat and onions with the garlic, rosemary and thyme. If necessary, add more cider (or even water), to almost cover the brisket. Bring to a simmer, then cover tightly. Place in the oven and bake until the brisket is fork-tender, about 3 hours.

Uncover and let the brisket cool in the pot. Cover and refrigerate until the next day. Scrape off and discard any hardened fat on the surface of the cooking liquid. Transfer the brisket to a carving board, and slice thinly against the grain.

Meanwhile, bring the cooking liquid to a boil over high heat. Taste, and if the flavour needs concentrating, simmer for a few minutes to evaporate excess liquid. Season with salt and pepper. Return the sliced brisket to the liquid, reduce the heat to medium-low, and simmer until heated through. Serve hot with the onions. Serves 8-10.

Iran wants to turn Hamas into Hezbollah: U.S. expert

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Iran wants the same control over Hamas it has over Hezbollah, an organization that is nothing less than a "delivery system" for Iranian weapons, Henry Crumpton, the U.S. State Department's counterterrorism coordinator, told the Jerusalem Post.

Crumpton, who last week held a joint counterterror dialogue with Israel, said that while most pundits think in terms of missiles when talking about Iranian delivery systems, Hezbollah – which he said is "just an extension of the Iranian government" – must be thought of in these terms as well.

"You combine the Iranian nuclear weapons program with Hezbollah, and that is a pretty nasty mixture," he said.

Crumpton said that while Iran does not yet have that kind of control over Hamas, "it is clearly an objective. The Iranians would love to have another proxy like that."

Asked what will keep Iran from gaining such control, Crumpton said, "I hope the Palestinian people, and I hope the leadership of Hamas, if they are going to be responsible or courageous enough."

Crumpton, a 20-year CIA veteran and highly respected former spy master, has been credited with coming up with the U.S. strategy after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks to use elite intelligence and military officers together with elements of Afghani society to oust the Taliban.

Faint echoes of a partnership strategy can be heard when he talks about the how the international community and United States should be acting vis-a-vis Hamas.

While the two situations are markedly different – primarily because the Taliban was foisted on the Afghans, and the Palestinians voted for Hamas – Crumpton said the similarity is that "Israel and the U.S. cannot impose our will, force our will on the Palestinian people – they have to be a part of this."

The soft-spoken Crumpton "starred" in the US' National Commission report on 9/11 as the person known simply as "Henry," who pressed the CIA to do more in Afghanistan to hunt down Osama bin Laden before the attacks in the United States, but who had two of his key proposals rejected. He also figured prominently in Bob Woodward's book on the war in Afghanistan, Bush at War, this time as the CIA operative "Hank" who – among other things – understood the importance of money and aid in gaining the support of Afghan warlords.

"This is not about us versus them," Crumpton said about Hamas and the Palestinian Authority. "It is about the Palestinian people working with foreign partners – the U.S., Europe and Israel – to persuade the new Hamas government to be responsible, or if not, then eventually get a new government in there."

While he did not say that the goal was to economically destabilize the PA so that the population would turn on Hamas, he did say the United States was not interested in giving Hamas a "free ride."

"This is not about destabilizing the PA – it is about providing humanitarian assistance to the Palestinian people while not supporting Hamas, and giving Hamas the political opportunity to step forward and become responsible leaders," Crumpton said. He was not, however, starry-eyed about the prospects of Hamas rising to the occasion by recognizing Israel, accepting previous agreements with it, and renouncing terrorism.

"I think it will be tough," he said. "I think that they will have to make some bold decisions, and fundamentally change the way they look at Israel and the world. It won't be easy for them. I'm not kidding myself about this. To a large degree, violence is part of their identity – it defines who they are. But change is not impossible."

Analysis

Exposing Hamas

By BARRY RUBIN
Jerusalemp Post

How can a conservative British aristocrat, a German revolutionary philosopher and a New York Yankees catcher teach us to understand the new era in the Middle East?

Let's begin with the philosopher, Karl Marx, who wrote that history does repeat itself, but not precisely. The first time something happens, it takes place as tragedy, the second time as farce.

This certainly applies to the way Hamas is repeating the history of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), fooling the same people who should have learned better from the first go-round. Even the fact that virtually no one notices this duplication of the past is sufficient proof of the triumph of foolishness – even more so than the first time it was done.

Back in February 1974, the PLO's basic program of "Let's throw the Jews into the sea" was not exactly an inspired PR slogan. As a result, the PLO leader, master showman Yasser Arafat, came up with a new idea.

The PLO stated that its aim was to "establish a national authority on any lands that can be wrested from Zionist occupation." Arafat explained that this did not mean peace or recognition of Israel within its pre-1967 borders; instead, if the Palestinians gained the West Bank and Gaza Strip, they would use them as a base to attain total victory.

In this two-stage plan to eliminate Israel, terrorism, the demand that all Palestinian refugees return to their ancestors' pre-1948 homes and the rejection of negotiations with Israel would all continue. In Arafat's words, the strategy was not about peace, but about "how the rest of Palestine is to be liberated." And if any regime was established in the territories, its main duty would be to complete "the liberation of all Palestinian soil" by wiping Israel off the map in an act of genocide.

Marx wrote in favour of revolutionary candor: "The communists disdain to conceal their aims." Similarly, the PLO told us exactly what they intended. One merely had to read their speeches and documents. If the rest of the world wanted to pretend otherwise, well, that was scarcely Arafat's fault.

Of course there were cute gimmicks. For example, when a PLO leader declared: "We want to liberate all the Palestinian territories," Palestinians knew he meant everything, while Westerners could pretend he was talking only about the West Bank, the Gaza Strip and east Jerusalem. It was a strategy British comedians call "nudge, nudge; wink, wink."

Shortly after that, Arafat was invited to the United Nations, since his plan supposedly made him a moderate. Still, perhaps one shouldn't complain too much about the "first coming" of the two-stage plan, because it took 20 years for the PLO to evolve far enough – in terms of giving lip service to moderation – for real recognition and negotiation to begin, with the 1993 Oslo agreement.

Yet here we are, nearly 13 years later, and even the PLO's promises have been shown to be hollow. In point of fact, the Palestinian nationalists are still back in 1974. Now, fast forward to the present and Hamas. This brings us to Lord Chesterfield, who warned that those who do not learn from history are doomed to repeat it. The Hamas victory has rolled the clock back about 32 years.

The statements that are winning Hamas positive treatment and the "moderate" seal of approval are almost precisely the same as the ones the PLO expressed in 1974. Indeed, Hamas' strategy must be deliberate in this regard. The most important statement made by Hamas since the election was the one made by Musa Abu Marzouk, the deputy head of its Political Bureau, in a Feb. 14 interview with Dream 2 TV (see www.memritv.org).

Marzouk explained: "Hamas believes that all of Palestine..., from the [Jordan] River to the [Mediterranean] Sea, belongs to the Palestinians." The current phase is to seek control over the West Bank, Jerusalem and the Gaza Strip, but that "is a temporary and phased solution. This is not the permanent solution."

Hamas is also demanding that all the descendants of the Palestinian refugees move back to Israel.

In a remarkable comment, Marzouk likened the plan to a "truce" of the past, saying, "After all, there was a hudna from 1948 until 1967, and no Arab country recognized Israel." Of course, during that time Palestinian terrorism against Israel continued.

So not only is Marzouk demanding Israel give up all the territory and let in a couple of million Palestinians, with a level of disruption, violence and subversion that can be easily imagined, but even those concessions will not bring even a temporary cessation of terrorism, incitement and other measures against Israel.

Back in the 1970s and 1980s, despite some major shortcomings, most of the western world recognized that the PLO was a terrorist organization that did not deserve to be called moderate or be treated as a partner for talks or a recipient of aid. There were 20 years of pressure to achieve at least the appearance of change, only for the West to discover that this was the same type of group it had been all along.

But now, many are willing to grant all the benefits to Hamas, a decision based on a record, statements and a plan that can only be termed worse than what Arafat offered in 1974. Moreover, Hamas is making clear that it will continue the most extreme incitement to hate and kill Jews since the Third Reich, teaching this as the main lesson in Palestinian schools.

Given everything we know and see, it would probably take Hamas at least 20 years to reach a level of dissimulation equal to Arafat's, much less any sincere shift toward moderation – which even its Fatah rivals have not yet achieved.

This leaves us with the wisdom of that great baseball player, Yogi Berra: "It's déjà vu all over again!"

Suspect arrested in killing of Parisian Jew

By MICHEL ZLOTOWSKI
Jerusalem Post

PARIS — A ceremony closing the shivah for Ilan Halimi, the Parisian Jew who died after enduring brutal and extended torture at the hands of his Muslim kidnappers, was held last Thursday evening at the main synagogue in Paris' 10th Quarter.

The ceremony was attended by France's Chief Rabbi Joseph Sitruk, who called on all Frenchmen, Jews and non-Jews alike, to participate in ceremonies held in memory of Halimi throughout France. President Jacques Chirac and Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin were also at the ceremony at the Victoire Synagogue.

President Chirac and his wife, Bernadette, comforted Halimi's mother, Ruth, and her two daughters as they entered the temple.

More than 2,000 people came to the synagogue, which could only seat 1,400; hundreds of Jews and non-Jews were compelled to remain outside in the freezing cold.

Halimi, 23, was kidnapped Jan. 21 and was held for three weeks; he was tortured in the southern Paris suburb of Bagneux. On Feb. 13, French authorities found Halimi naked, handcuffed and covered with burn marks near railroad tracks south of Paris. He died on his way to a hospital.

Halimi was abducted after a meeting with a young woman. His family later received a series of ransom demands – starting with one for around half a million euros.

French officials believe anti-Semitism may have played a role in the crime.

The Paris prosecutor revealed Halimi's case to the media on Feb. 14, the day after he died. He said then that "no element of the current investigation could link this murder to an anti-Semitic declaration or action." The Jewish community did not believe him, and was already buzzing with rumours that other Jews had been abducted after dating blond women.

The police issued Identikit pictures of the female suspect, and a few days later, a young blond woman turned herself in to police. Her information led almost immediately to the identification of the men who allegedly kidnapped and tortured Halimi.

The lead suspect in the brutal torture killing of Halami was arrested in the Ivory Coast last Thursday and was to be returned to France immediately, the French prime minister's office said.

Ivory Coast President Laurent Gbagbo assured de Villepin that the suspect who fled France would be flown back "in the coming hours." A statement from Villepin's office said the quick transfer of the suspect, Youssouf Fofana, a French citizen, amounted to "judicial help." There had been questions about whether procedural issues could delay Fofana's extradition.

Up to a dozen people have been arrested in the case.

Fofana was arrested in Abidjan's northern suburb of Abobo, police in Abidjan and Paris said. He had flown to Ivory Coast on a commercial flight days after the discovery of Halimi's body.

At first three and then seven members of the gang were taken into custody for questioning. Fofana, 25, their leader, managed to escape investigators. He simply bought a ticket to Abidjan and flew to the Ivory Coast under his own name.

According to the police, Fofana – who likes to call himself "Brain of Barbarians" – is a Muslim of African origin, like some members of his group. Others are second-generation immigrants – Arabs from North Africa and others from the French Antilles and Portugal – and some are from families that have long lived in France.

Sources in Abidjan said that Fofana admitted his participation in the kidnapping of Ilan, but denied any anti-Semitic intention.

Police said that during the investigation, some of the suspects said they had indeed chosen Halimi as their victim "because Jews are rich, and if they are not, their community will pay for their release." One of the youngest members of the gang, aged 16, reportedly admitted having tortured Ilan with a burning cigarette because the young man was Jewish. He also reportedly admitted having extinguished a cigarette on Halimi's forehead "because he was bothering me."

The investigating judge, having heard the testimony of the first suspects, issued an arrest order for kidnapping and murder, including the aggravating circumstance of anti-Semitism.

In a letter to Roger Cukierman, president of France's organized Jewish community, Canadian Jewish Congress national president Ed Morgan and CJC chair of the executive Victor Goldbloom expressed the Canadian Jewish community's profound sadness over the incident, offered its condolences and support to the Halimi family and pledged its "indefatigable solidarity" to French Jewry.

"Our hearts are with you… and we pray for a world where good will and respect will triumph over hatred," the letter stated.

Morgan said in a statement that it's clear "the French authorities are taking this anti-Semitic crime very seriously and are demonstrating their solidarity with the Jews of France. The severity of this crime demands an appropriately severe punishment in order for justice to be served."

Goldbloom added that the criminal investigation into the case "must not only be thorough but should [also] make every effort to shed light on the mindset of and the external influences on the criminals involved in this case. This is a crucial step in the effort to ensure that horrific crimes like this never happen again."

Israel Briefs

Warning of Hamas state

The head of Shin Bet said Israel must not enter into a long-term truce with Hamas. In his first address to the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee since the Islamist group began taking power in the PA, Yuval Diskin said Israel faces a "strategic threat" from Hamas. "If a Hamas state is established, that could mobilize along Israel's borders with a military capability… that's a strategic threat," Diskin said. "We can't accept a truce if the price is that… every Islamic organization from Saudi Arabia to Iran, Global Jihad to Al Qaeda, will come." Hamas says it won't renounce terror and recognize Israel, offering a protracted ceasefire instead. Israel has rejected the proposal as a ruse to regroup and rearm.

Iran offers to fund PA

Iran has offered to fund the Palestinian Authority. "The United States proved that it would not support democracy after it cut its aid to the Palestinian government after Hamas won the elections. We will certainly help the Palestinians," Ali Larijani, secretary of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, said last week after meeting in Tehran with Hamas leader Khaled Meshaal. Israel, which has long said Iran seeks to destabilize its ties with the Palestinians, vowed to block funds from reaching the West Bank and Gaza. Also last week, Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit told U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice that Egypt isn't ready to cut off Hamas. The United States wants the Arab world to join it in cutting off Hamas until it recognizes Israel and renounces violence. "We should give Hamas time," he said. "I am sure that Hamas will develop, will evolve. We should not prejudge the issue."

Bird flu co-operation

Tests are underway in Israel to determine whether samples of blood and saliva from livestock and dead wild fowl, received from Palestinian Authority officials, confirm fears of possible outbreaks of foot-and-mouth disease and bird flu in Gaza. Israeli officials warned that outbreaks of either disease would not only jeopardize Palestinians in Gaza, but also Israelis. "It is in Israel's interest to ensure that agricultural standards in Gaza are maintained," an Israeli official told the Jerusalem Post.

Sharon treated

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon had fluid removed from his stomach in a minor procedure last week at Hadassah Hospital. He's been in a coma there since Jan. 4, when he suffered a major stroke. Otherwise, his condition was unchanged.

Politician fights cancer

Veteran Israeli politician Benny Elon has cancer. A rabbi and leader of the nationalist-religious National Union bloc, Elon told Yediot Achronot that there is a tumour in his vocal cords. He was to start chemotherapy this week, but said he doesn't intend to withdraw from the March 28 general election. Elon, 51, said his doctors are optimistic because the growth was discovered early.

Police, evacuees meet

Police who took part in the demolition of nine houses in Amona last month, an action that led to violence between protesters and police, held a meeting with Gush Etzion Regional Council head Shaul Goldstein and representatives of the public. Those present included Judea and Samaria Police chief Yisrael Yitzhak and officers who were injured in the clashes. The sides agreed to continue the dialogue, which they hope will include youth, as many of the Amona protesters were young people. The Knesset has formed a committee to probe the Amona evacuation.

Israelis called 'good drivers'

Cmdr. Shachar Ayalon, head of the National Traffic Police, publicly disagreed with the notion that Israeli drivers are bad. "It's not true, it's a myth," he told the group's annual conference. "Israelis are good drivers. They are like every other driver." Accident statistics for 2005 do indicate that the roads are becoming safer. Deaths fell to 475 from 520 the year before, with the 2005 amount the second-lowest in the last 30 years and the lowest since 1982. The number of deaths so far in 2006 has fallen to 63 from 68 in the same period in 2005.

Israel & the Jewish World

CJC leads AFN on first-ever joint mission to Israel

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Jews have a lot more in common with Canada's aboriginal peoples than one might think.

Like Jews, Canada's aboriginals are a unified but nonetheless diverse group. As well, native peoples also have a tragic history of persecution, and they continue to struggle over land, the retention of their languages and cultures, and finding their rightful place among the nations.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) CEO Bernie Farber may have put it best: "In the Jews, Canada's First Nations see an indigenous people who have reclaimed their land and by so doing have reinvigorated their culture and language."

Phil Fontaine

Farber, along with CJC president Ed Morgan, led the first-ever joint Canadian Jewish Congress-Assembly of First Nations (AFN) educational mission to Israel last week.

More than 20 AFN affiliates – including AFN national Chief Phil Fontaine, New Brunswick Chief Peter Barlow, Saskatchewan Chief Kelly Bird, Manitoba Chief Tina Levesque, Yukon Territory Chief Rick O'Brien, and Beverley Jacobs, president of the Native Women's Association of Canada – spent a week touring historical sites and meeting various specialists and dignitaries, including Canadian Ambassador Donald Sinclair and President Moshe Katsav.

During last Wednesday's meeting with Katsav, Barlow proposed that Israel start a diplomatic relationship with Canada's indigenous peoples.

"You know how hard it was for you to be recognized," Barlow said. "We want to establish a diplomatic mission here. We are looking to become globally accepted and global players."

While Katsav didn't comment on the request, he noted that Jews were able to return to their ancestral homeland after 2,000 years in exile because they maintained the heritage that united them. "I call on you to keep your heritage and revive your language," he said.

The trip was Morgan's way of reciprocating for Fontaine's invitation to take part in the AFN's annual Grand Assembly in Yellowknife last July. "There, the Jewish community leadership learned a little bit more about Native Canadian issues," Morgan said. "In exchange, we wanted to introduce them to Israel, to learn more about Jewish history and issues."

It seems to have worked.

"The trip has been overwhelming," said Fontaine, who as head of the AFN represents 633 native communities and a total of 750,000 people across Canada. "It has been a real eye-opener!"

Much of the trip was dedicated to learning from Israeli experts about best practices in agriculture and the preservation of minority languages, areas of common concern for both peoples.

Participants visited the Weizmann Institute for Science in Rehovot, the Golda Meir Mount Carmel International Training Center, the Dan Fish Farms in the north (in co-operation with Israel's Ministry of Agriculture and Rural Development), and Kibbutz Sde Eliyahu, which is involved in industries such as fish hatcheries and agriculture.

"Israel has some expertise in agriculture in harsh climates," said Morgan, adding that although Israel's climate is very different from Canada's, both Israel and aboriginal reserves struggle with economic development in remote regions. "Israeli science has a lot to offer," he added.

Of even greater interest to Fontaine and his colleagues was Israel's expertise in the field of near-dormant languages.

"I am extremely interested to know how the Jewish people were able to revitalize Hebrew so that it became a first language," said Fontaine. He noted that there are 55 indigenous languages in Canada, but only three – Ojibway, Cree and Inuktitut – are spoken, while the rest are disappearing.

"Once they are gone from Canada, they will disappear forever because Canada is the homeland of those languages," Fontaine said. "When you lose a language, you lose a lot. Language is a repository for everything that we are as a people and a culture."

A lecture by scholar Shuki Ben-Ami about the survival of minority languages offered many ideas for language immersion programs, Fontaine said. "I believe we can take advantage of Israel's experience in this field."

Among the similarities between Jews and aboriginal peoples is the centrality of religion in their cultural identities, Morgan said, noting that the native group – a mix of observant and non-observant Christians of various denominations, and followers of indigenous religions – was inspired to conduct small religious ceremonies at each destination on the tour.

"It has been very interesting and very moving for us to learn more about their spirituality," Morgan said.

As well, Fontaine noted that just as Jews have unity in their diversity, there is also "incredible diversity in our community – unique histories, values, traditions, and teachings – but we are all First Nations."

A third, and perhaps most integral, area of commonality is a desire for land, self-government and autonomy. "The Jews have not felt fulfilled, in all their wanderings in this world, until gaining sovereignty over their own piece of land," says Morgan. "It's a yearning that the aboriginals also feel. They take a lot from the Jewish experience."

Fontaine noted that of the more than 1,000 land claims filed by his group, some 300 have been validated by Ottawa. "We want our land – land that rightfully belongs to us," he said. "We want to be self-governing within the constitutional framework of Canada. We want to take the decisions that affect us as individuals, as families, and as communities. We want to be self-sustaining."

Farber recalled a lecturer explaining to the group that it took Jews 2,000 years to reclaim their land. "Well, it won't take us 2,000 years!" Fontaine responded.

The emotional highlight of the tour was the group's visit to the Yad Vashem holocaust museum.

"The Holocaust was an attempt to eradicate the entire Jewish people," Fontaine said. "In a less dramatic way, we have experienced the same thing. The government of Canada has made a great attempt to assimilate us – to eradicate any sense of 'Indianness'. The consequences have been similarly tragic."

Fontaine added that he has "always believed that the struggle of the Jewish people in so many ways mirrors our own struggle. After coming here, what strikes me the most is the resilience of the Jewish people – to have survived all they have survived and to still manage to be this incredible presence on the world stage."

The Royal Chronicles

This story has been adapted from the Book of Esther Verses 6:1 - 6:10.

King Achashverosh of Persia rolled over in his plush bed. It must be almost midnight already, he thought angrily, and still I can't fall asleep. Of course, with everything that's going on, how can I? That party Esther made today... why would my queen risk her life and come into my throne room unannounced just to invite me to her party? And why did she also invite Haman? Prime Minister Haman is a great guy, and his plan to kill all the Jews is nothing short of genius, but why did Esther have to single him out? Why is she trying to win his favour? Is it possible that they're conspiring to kill me, like Bigtan and Teresh tried to do last year? Oh, I'm letting my imagination run away with me. Why can't I just go to sleep. Achashverosh tried settling into the bedspreads. Forget it! It's no use! That's it. I'm going to have to resort to drastic measures. "Guards! Bring me the royal chronicles."

The servants hastened to the canopied bed. "A thousand pardons, Your Majesty, but which year does his majesty desire?"

"Try 67. That was an uneventful year, if I remember correctly."

Two servants rushed to the records chamber to retrieve the volume. They returned bearing the enormous leather-bound book. "Which entry does his Majesty wish to see?"

"Nothing specific. Just read it out loud from the beginning. When I fall asleep, stop."

"The peasants of Medea petitioned the king to lower the taxes by at least five per cent on all grain being exported to distant provinces, due to a lack of..."

I feel tired already, thought the King.

"...when the legislature redacted a preexisting edict, expanding governmental control over all millet grown within the district of..."

Just a few more minutes and I'll be asleep. What a great idea...

"...The two of them sought to assassinate the King by poisoning his water. In the chaos following the King's death, they would escape undetected..." droned the servant.

So much for the boring stuff, thought Achashverosh, suddenly wide awake.

"In all likelihood their plan would have succeeded if not for the intervention of Mordechai the Jew, who alerted the palace of the conspiracy."

Achashverosh sat up. The servants jumped back, startled.

"Mordechai the Jew...what reward was given to him for this?"

The servants frantically skimmed the page, but found nothing. "It looks like he was not rewarded at all."

"How strange. Perhaps...what's that? I hear something in the courtyard."

"The servants scrambled to the window. Someone was walking through the courtyard! In the moonlight, they could make out the three cornered hat of —

"Haman, Your Majesty!"

"What could he possibly want at this hour?" The king paused. "Bring him in."

As Haman ascended the staircase, he pondered how to phrase his request. How about, "Your Majesty knows the filthy nature of the Jews. I can't wait a whole year before the killings begin. May I have His Majesty's permission to hang Mordechai, their leader, on the gallows I have just constructed?" Or maybe, "When Mordechai the Jew refuses to bow down to me, he is flagrantly rebelling against the the king's authority. If the king agrees, I will have Mordechai hung for his atrocities."

"Haman!" called out Ahasuerus before Haman had a chance to say anything. "What perfect timing! There's something I just wanted to ask you. What do you think I should do for someone I really wish to honour?"

Honour, thought Haman, He must mean me, who else would it be?

"Only the very best," answered Haman. "The man the king wishes to honor should be dressed in regal robes, and paraded through the capital city on the king's personal horse. Leading the horse should be one of the king's nobles, who should call out, 'This is what is done for the man whom the King wishes to honour!'"

In his head, Haman could already hear the music, the fanfare, the boisterous cheers of the watching throngs.

"What a great idea!" replied the King. "Quickly, take the royal robes. Get the horse. And personally parade through the city... Mordechai the Jew, who saved my life!"

Haman's jaw dropped. Now is probably not the time to bring up the gallows, he thought miserably, as he contemplated the humiliation that lay in store for him.

"But...but..."

"I don't want to hear anything, Haman. It was your idea. Please arrange the parade. Now. Good night."

Mazon offers gourmet response to hunger

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Mazon Canada, A Jewish Response To Hunger's eighth annual fundraiser, An Evening of Kosher Delicacies and Wine Tasting, is set for March 8 at the Capitol Event Theatre.

Formerly called the Kosher Gourmet Gala, the event features kosher chefs and wine merchants who offer guests the opportunity to sample kosher cuisine.

Each of the 10 food stations will be paired with a corresponding wine, allowing people to maximize the gourmet experience, says Shira Lester-Cohen, Mazon executive director.

Featured at the evening, chaired by Mazon national president Tammy Anklewicz, will be Brick Brewery, Caterers York, Cravings to Go, DSM Foods, Eventfull Specialty Event Bars, Grafstein Wines, GMB Culinary, Guilt Free Cookies, Mazel Wines, Metropolitan Ice, Once Upon a Cake, Paradise Banquet Hall, Park Toronto, Simcha Wine, Strub Pickles, Taam Tov, Windsor Arms Hotel and Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers.

For the first time, says Lester-Cohen, there will be entertainment at the gala, including live music by Paul Gelman and Jordan Clapman, "modest" belly dancing by Mayada's Belly Dance, and psychological illusionist Thomas Baxter.

About 20 children are also involved in a "surprise" event, she says.

"Our decorator, Ian Whitaker, has donated his time, and with all his work, the gala will have a very elegant feel to it."

Not only is this Mazon's major fundraiser, says Lester-Cohen, it is an opportunity for kosher caterers and wine merchants to give something back to the community because all wine and food is donated.

Representatives of three of Mazon's recipient agencies – it donates about $500,000 to agencies across the country – will say a few words, says Lester-Cohen, "because we want to remind people what we are all about.

"When they make a simchah, they need to remember those who can't eat. [Their simchah] is an opportunity to symbolically invite a hungry stranger to their table."

Lester-Cohen says their goal is to raise $100,000, which is earmarked for non-denominational agencies including Flemington Public School in Toronto, Loves and Fishes Community Bank Foundation in British Columbia, Maison Shalom in Quebec and Melville and District Food Bank in Saskatchewan.

Tickets are $85 each. For information, call Mazon at 416-783-7554 or go online to www.mazoncanada.ca.

Israeli-Palestinian film, culture fest opens

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Toronto plays host to a unique cultural event this week – the first time in which movies by Israeli and Palestinian filmmakers will be showcased in a single program of film, music, theatre and discussion.

Voices Forward: A Festival of Israeli and Palestinian Film and Culture will take place at various venues, including CanStage, the Royal Cinema and the Drake Hotel from March 3 to 5.

Below are previews of three of the documentaries scheduled to be screened at the three-day event. They probably typify its spirit.

* * *

Chaim Yavin, the evening news anchor at Channel One, Israeli state TV, has been a voice of authority in Israel for the past 30 years. Much like former CBS News anchor Walter Cronkite, Yavin is a respected, influential figure.

All the more reason that Yavin's timely, multi-part documentary, The Land of the Settlers, caused such an uproar when it was aired last summer on the eve of Israel's historic withdrawal from the Gaza Strip.

Yavin spent 2½ years travelling the length and breadth of Gaza and the West Bank to flesh out The Land of the Settlers. This is not objective journalism in the usual sense of the word, for Yavin's message is direct and unambiguous: If Israel truly wants peace, it must dismantle the settlements in the territories and withdraw. If it fails to do so, Israel runs the risk of becoming a binational state, which would doom the Zionist dream.

As Yavin put it in a recent piece in the Boston Globe: "Let's not base our existence on the acquisition of more and more land, but on building, within recognized borders, a better society based on true Jewish and universal values: justice, equality, culture, education, human rights."

Although Yavin's point of view permeates this visually appealing and intellectually rigorous film, he draws on interviews with dissenting Israelis who reject his thesis.

An angry Orthodox settler can't understand why he is no longer entitled to live in Gaza. Arieh Eldad, a member of the Knesset, decries the pending disengagement. Noam Livnat, a radical settler, claims that the government is leading Israel to civil war. Rabbi Yoel Bin-Nun argues that the retention of settlements does not conflict with the yearning for peace.

In a particularly interesting juxtaposition, a Holocaust survivor rebukes settlers who compare the evacuation of settlements with the mass murder of Jews, while her son, a settler, criticizes the government for abandoning Gaza.

Yavin talks to several Israeli army reservists, including a colonel from a West Bank settlement, who either oppose the occupation or are ready for territorial compromise, and to a noted philosopher who warns of the consequences of endless war with the Palestinians. He also confronts two Israeli border police officers who have been accused of brutality.

Scenes of soldiers forcibly removing settlers from an unauthorized outpost punctuate the film, giving it the immediacy of a nightly newscast. The impression is heightened by glimpses of Yavin aiming his camcorder at interviewees.

One of them, Haim Hanegbi, is a universalist who expresses support for a binational state and the right of Palestinian refugees to return to their homes in what is now Israel. He fervently believes that if the Israeli government was able to form a close relationship with Germany in the wake of the Holocaust, Israel can surely forge peace with the Palestinians.

Pouring scorn on the notion that Israel's occupation is "enlightened," Yavin is pessimistic about the prospect of Israel reaching an accommodation with the Palestinians. Indeed, he predicts that a third Palestinian uprising is imminent.

* * *

Occupied Minds is about a pair of unlikely colleagues, an Israeli and a Palestinian, both born in Jerusalem, who visit each other's neighbourhoods in Israel and the territories in an attempt "to face the harsh realities of our shared land."

David Michaelis, the son of German Jews, was a television producer in Israel until he moved to the United States six years ago to co-found Link TV, a satellite network specializing in coverage of the Middle East. Jamal Dajani, Link TV's director of Middle East programming, has lived in the United States since 1975.

Michaelis and Dajani, the co-directors of Occupied Minds, are committed to finding a peaceful solution to the conflict between the Israelis and the Palestinians. But they disagree on the method. Dajani wants a one-state solution, while Michaelis favours a two-state solution.

Despite their profound disagreement on so vital an issue, they are companionable travellers – paying visits to their respective homes in Jerusalem; travelling to Gaza and Hebron, where tensions simmer; talking to an Israeli doctor injured in a suicide bombing, and stopping at an Israeli checkpoint near Jerusalem.

In addition, they interview an Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade militant who answers their questions in fairly fluent Hebrew; speak to a Palestinian psychiatrist who claims that the current breed of suicide bombers are the sons of Palestinians humiliated by Israeli soldiers in the first intifadah; talk with an Israeli settler who gently suggests that Palestinians should move en masse to Jordan; and they visit the West Bank security barrier, which cuts into the land of a Palestinian farmer.

Occupied Minds scratches the surface of an explosive conflict whose resolution lies far in the distance. Michaelis and Dajani expose us to its dangerous fault lines.

* * *

Knowledge is the Beginning, shot over a six-year period in various locales in the Middle East and Europe, tells the story of an Israeli/Arab youth orchestra founded by Israeli musician Daniel Barenboim and the now deceased Palestinian American intellectual Edward Said.

The film unfolds through rehearsals, concert excerpts and interviews. We learn that the young musicians have great respect for Barenboim, that its Arab members seem to be willing to reassess their jaundiced views of Israelis, and that Said respects Barenboim as a person who can empathize with other people's sufferings.

As for Barenboim, he believes that music can shatter barriers, but this belief carries only so much weight and may be overly optimistic.

Play shows how food creates community

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

In many respects, food is our lifeline, but it is not only our primary source of physical nourishment. Meals are often the centrepieces of our social gatherings and symbols of our cultures.

Watching people eat – smelling, feeling and tasting their food – and listening to their mealtime discussions would therefore provide insight into their real world.

And that is precisely what The Arab-Israeli Cookbook strives to do.

Produced and performed in a documentary-like style, the play explores the lives of everyday people from Israel and the Palestinian territories using their own words, as they prepare food, eat and talk.

Some 85 real people hailing from Gaza, the West Bank, Tel Aviv and other places in the area were interviewed for the production.

None of the people interviewed was seeking power or in power, says director and co-producer Joel Greenberg, 57. "They were all normal people, and that's very important."

Greenberg explains that by focusing on ordinary people, audiences will get a taste of what life is like on the ground in the midst of conflict.

"The people who are interviewed… are trying to find some degree of normalcy," he says.

"[Although they] are struggling, many of them find ways of coping and of moving forward and… not being paralyzed by fear, anger or hatred."

The cast of The Arab-Israeli Cookbook.

Despite this, the director notes that some of the characters, who range in age from 19 to 75, have lost loved ones during the intifadah.

A unique aspect of the play is that the food is made on stage, with the intention that the sizzling sounds and wafting aromas will tickle the senses of the audience.

"The food is both a literal and a metaphoric symbol of sustenance," reflects Greenberg, a 35-year theatre veteran who has worked on more than 100 productions and is a drama professor at the University of Waterloo.

"Food creates community and… we are visiting a region where people are all eating essentially the same food."

While some of the dialogue delves into political issues, Greenberg says the play does not attempt to take a particular side, adding that none of the actors is Jewish.

"The writers and directors have done their very best to just present stories without putting themselves in the middle," he says. "Nobody at the end presents a moral or suggests there is an answer. The play is about people doing their best to figure out how to live a normal life, in an abnormal situation."

Written by British playwright Robin Soans, The Arab-Israeli Cookbook has already received critical acclaim in England and Los Angeles. It makes its Canadian premiere March 3 at Toronto's Berkeley Street Theatre and runs until April 1.

For tickets, visit www.ticketking.com or phone 416-368-3110 or 1-800-461-3333.

LODZ GHETTO TO KAFKA FEATURED IN BRICK LITERARY JOURNAL

Brick, the Toronto-based literary journal edited by Michael Redhill, is known for its diverse range of cultural offerings and contributors, ranging from the celebrated to the obscure. The current issue, for instance, presents pieces that invoke James Joyce and William Faulkner, along with stories by or about mortals of lesser stature and renown. The implicit assertion is that all are deserving of attention.

Presented in a refreshingly eccentric mix, the two dozen pieces in the current issue are individualistic and intriguing, as usual for Brick. But this issue, perhaps for the first time, features an innately Jewish theme. Its several articles of Jewish provenance include Canadian writer Norman Levine's first short story and a portfolio of rare photographs from the Lodz ghetto.

Levine wrote to Redhill offering his story A Sabbath Walk in June 2005, less than a week before he died. The well-crafted story is about the persecution of an artist in a small town. Levine wrote it in Cornwall in 1949 and it was previously published in Italy in 1956.

Henryk Ross used a camera clandestinely to capture scenes in the Lodz ghetto during the Nazi regime. Brick reprinted nine photos, including the one on its cover of two lovers kissing, accompanied by Ross' explanatory testimony given at the Eichmann trial. "In making life in the ghetto more real to us, in showing us that these people did more than suffer, the photographs give us a new sense of who these people were," Redhill comments.

The issue also presents The Devil and the Storyteller, an essay by Toronto writer Ken Sherman comparing stories by Reb Nachman of Bratslav, Franz Kafka and Bernard Malamud. According to Sherman, these writers hearken to an earlier age of simpler, more elegant story-telling and more universal themes; and all three draw a similar "father-obstructor" archetype in their fiction.

As well, the three "are all dealing with self-actualization," Sherman told Eye on Arts. "Another thing that links them is that there's a kind of urgency in their stories, a sense that people have souls and that their souls need to be saved or fulfilled."

Other contributors to the Winter 2005 issue include Colm Toibin, Esta Spalding, David Sedaris, Oliver Sacks, Geoff Dyer (writing on W.S. Sebald and Thomas Bernhard) and Eleanor Wachtel. Order a subscription to Brick via the website www.brickmag.com.

* * *

Names in the News: Toronto composer-trumpeter David Buchbinder has gained many kudos lately for his debut solo recording, Shurum Burum Jazz Circus. Kafka and Son remounted at the JCC

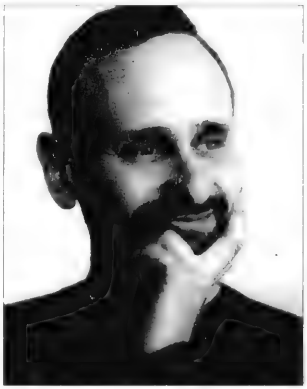
By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

In the famous Letter to His Father, celebrated Jewish writer Franz Kafka said that "my writing was all about you."

Indeed, Kafka felt his fiction found its inspiration – albeit a tormented one – from the complicated relationship he had with his father, Hermann.



Alon Nashman

An adaptation of this letter, particularly the father-son dichotomy, is the focus of the one-man play Kafka and Son, starring Dora-nominated actor Alon Nashman.

"The play starts with a man in his room writing and then we enter his memory, visiting him at different stages and episodes of his life," says Nashman, 46, who portrays both Franz and Hermann in the production.

"All of the episodes are about some interaction with his father. We are building a flesh and blood picture of this man's life, understanding more deeply the sources of his fiction, because all of his great books are inspired by this relationship."

The Czech-born-and-raised Kafka, who was born in 1883, wrote a number of revered novels, including The Metamorphosis and The Trial.

A common theme running through his literature were the challenges of power and authority, as well as feelings of alienation and dehumanization in a bureaucratic world.

"He wrote in a way that no one else did," notes Nashman, who first began reading Kafka as a teenager and did extensive research on him to prepare for the play.

"He wrote in a way that was utterly truthful... and there are ways in which you can tell from even the relationship with his father, that there was this pull towards industrialization and bureaucracy, which leads to the dehumanization of people."

Nashman first presented the Kafka play at the Ashkenaz Festival in 2002. Last year, he presented it in a special series of one-person productions at the World Stage festival.

The two Ashkenaz Festival shows were sold out and the World Stage engagement was well received.

So what's it like being a one-man show?

"I compare it to figure skating" notes the 15-year acting veteran, using an analogy to explain the inner workings of flying solo on stage.

"You've got your formative program, the music starts and then you just go, staying very focused."

Nashman expects a varied reaction from audiences, particularly based on their age and stage in life.

"One reaction is that for a sensitive child who wants to create and cares deeply about the suffering in the world, [yet] feels misunderstood by parents and authority figures," Nashman reflects.

"Then there are those who will experience it more from the father's point of view. For instance, if you have a child who is non-communicative and doesn't seem to be happy in their own skin, it's frustrating. You've given them help and they just won't get it together."

Kafka didn't leave home until after the age of 35 and died from tuberculosis at 40.

But his legacy in literature, especially the observations about industrialized societies, remain highly relevant today, spawning the use of the term Kafkaesque in our modern vernacular.

Kafka and Son runs from March 6 to 18 at the Al Green Theatre in the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

Tickets are available by calling 416-504-7529 or online at www.artsboxoffice.ca.

An Exhibition of Photos in the Theatre Lobby
As a complement to the play, this extraordinary travelling photo exhibit from Givat Haviva (recipient of the 2001 UNESCO Prize for Peace Education) comes to the Berkeley Street Theatre lobby from March 3 to April 1, 2006. Through Others' Eyes reflects the cooperative work of Jewish and Arab youth from neighbouring villages "looking" and getting to know each other from new and different perspectives. The series of photographs documents participants' visits to each other's homes and communities, where they captured images of the unfamiliar. Their interactions have led to a deeper understanding of one another, lasting friendships and a profound bond amongst all contributors.

Feeling Jewish in America theme of Stars of David

Stars of David* by Abigail Pogrebin, Random House Canada.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

How do prominent Americans such as Dustin Hoffman, Steven Spielberg, Edgar Bronfman, Mark Spitz, Richard Holbrooke and Larry King feel about being Jewish?

That's the question Abigail Pogrebin, a freelance journalist based in New York City, posed to more than 60 Jews who are major players in U.S. culture, business, politics, the law and sports.

Their answers are found in a series of tightly written essays in Stars of David, a 385-page book that examines attitudes toward identity and Israel.

Dustin Hoffman, a major Hollywood actor in the 1970s and '80s, grew up in Los Angeles, a city rife with what he describes as "insidious anti-Semitism." His marriage to his second and current wife took him on "a more Jewish path." Being Jewish, to him, is "not losing your humanity... or soul."

Abigail Pogrebin

The theme of exclusion has affected Ruth Bader Ginsburg, a U.S. Supreme Court judge. In her first year at Cornell University, students were assigned to dormitories on the basis of religion. When her mother died, only men could participate in the minyan. Sexism, she says, has kept her from embracing Jewish observance.

Before he wed his current wife, Kate Capshaw, a Protestant convert to Judaism, Steven Spielberg only felt his Judaism when he encountered anti-Semitism. Schindler's List, his 1993 film, went a long way toward bringing him back into the fold, but Capshaw's "profound interest" in her adopted faith is what ultimately convinced him to be a practising Jew. Spielberg observes Christmas "because it was a tradition in Kate's family and because it's the one holiday I wished I could have partaken in every year when I was growing up."

James Rubin, a former State Department spokesperson and the husband of CNN correspondent Christiane Amanpour, identifies with the part of Judaism that reaches out to the underdog and the oppressed. He has "an unsentimental" attitude toward Israel, but the Holocaust informs his understanding of world history.

Don Hewitt, the producer of 60 Minutes, has always felt more American than Jewish and does not observe Jewish holidays. He is Jewish by temperament and likes Jewish food, humour and people. He can't understand why the Jews, "the smartest people on the earth," established a state in the Middle East, "the most hostile place on earth." He adds, "They could have found a better place. They could have gone to Madagascar or something."

Mike Wallace, the correspondent emeritus of 60 Minutes, goes to bed each night reciting a Jewish prayer. Still, three of his four wives have been non-Jews. He celebrates Christmas and his son, Chris, the host of Fox News Sunday, was raised as a Catholic.

Ronald Perelman, the billionaire chairman of Revlon, is one of the relatively few Jews featured in this book who has incorporated Judaism deeply in his lifestyle. He prays every morning, keeps kosher and regularly attends synagogue. He became devout at the age of 18 after taking a family trip to Israel.

As a kid, Edgar Bronfman, the Canadian-born president of the World Jewish Congress and the former president of Seagram's distillery, rejected Judaism because he had an aversion to his domineering father, Samuel. But in his 50s, during a trip to the Soviet Union, he returned to his roots after watching Jews in Moscow defying a ban on worship and observing a Jewish holiday on the streets. Four of his five children have married Christians, but he doesn't blame them: "I didn't give them any Judaism growing up."

Richard Holbrooke, the U.S. envoy to the United Nations from 1999 to '01 and the ambassador to Germany from 1993 to '94, was raised by his German Jewish parents as a Quaker because they did not believe in organized religion. When asked about his identity, he said, "I don't call myself anything." But he freely acknowledges his Jewish background.

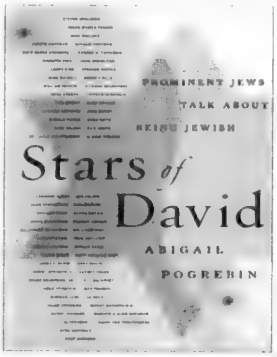
Larry King, the host of CNN's nightly talk show, is culturally and emotionally Jewish, having been turned off religious Judaism in Hebrew school. All his wives have been gentiles, and his current wife is a devout Mormon. They are raising their two children as Mormons.

Mark Spitz, who won seven gold medals in swimming at the 1972 Munich Olympic Games and is now a financial analyst and stockbroker, is consciously Jewish. Claiming that his embrace of Judaism has influenced younger people, he said: "It says that being a Jew is not something that limits you physically and athletically."

Ruth Reichl, the editor-in-chief of Gourmet magazine, was raised in an assimilated German family. But her Jewishness is an important component of her personality, though not in a religious sense."It's a great tradition to come from," she said. She feels distant from Israel, having been influenced by her anti-Zionist father.

Shawn Green, the baseball player who played with the Toronto Blue Jays, is not particularly religious. Yet he missed a game in 2001 in deference to Yom Kippur and takes pride in being recognized as a Jewish athlete. He and his Christian wife plan to expose their four-year-old daughter, Presley Taylor, to Jewish and non-Jewish traditions.

Dr. Laura Schlesinger, a radio talk-show host, is half-Catholic, her mother having been Italian. Schlesinger formally converted to Judaism and lived like an Orthodox Jew. But in a postscript, Pogrebin quotes her as saying that, although she considers herself Jewish, she no longer practises Judaism.



The movie actress Natalie Portman, who was born in Israel to an Israeli father (Dr. Avner Hershlag) and an American mother, uses her grandmother's maiden name. The materialism of American Jews alienates her, but as a student at Harvard, she felt herself being pulled toward the Jewish community.

Max Frankel, the former editor of The New York Times, escaped from Nazi Germany when he was eight. Having been a refugee, he recognizes the importance of Israel as a haven for persecuted Jews. But he has soured on nationalism as "the curse of our time" and now considers Israel an "artificial state."

Aaron Brown, the former CNN broadcaster, is of two minds about Judaism. As he put it: "There's a theological component, which I don't spend a lot of time with. And then I think there is a cultural, historical part which I clearly embrace, which is an important part of my life..."

It's clear that many of the Jewish personalties Pogrebin interviewed have abandoned their customs, intermarried and do not worry about Jewish continuity. Yet all feel distinctly Jewish, as she does.

"What I do know is that being Jewish is powerful and, in a sense, unavoidable – whether one embraces it or leaves it on the shelf..."

This, indeed, is the impression a reader carries away from these interviews.

The Wall producer inducted into hall of fame

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Bob Ezrin's musical odyssey has truly come full circle.

Singing and dancing as a toddler in Toronto, Ezrin eventually grew up to be a major player in the world of rock, producing mega albums for Pink Floyd, Kiss, Alice Cooper and Peter Gabriel.

After living the high life in New York and Los Angeles, Ezrin is now back in his hometown, where quite appropriately, he'll be inducted into the Canadian Music Hall of Fame on March 2.

"The fact this hónour comes from my colleagues and my countrymen, that's a very special category of people to me," says Ezrin, 56, a father/stepfather of six.

"Since the Juno's two years ago, it seems like the country has just been opening up its arms and welcoming me back."

Ezrin's musical nurturing in Toronto was very much a family affair.

His dad was a savvy bass player, mom played piano and Uncle Sid Ezrin owned a Yorkville club, as well as a formidable jazz collection and a bevy of other musical goodies..

"My Uncle Sid, who maybe had the greatest influence on me… had a basement full of turntables and music equipment," says Ezrin.

"Even at seven or eight years old, I was recording and playing around."

Along with his brothers, Ezrin performed on radio and television as a kid and he refined his musical skills studying piano and guitar.

Music was also a key part of Ezrin's membership in United Synagogue Youth.

The big foray into producing occurred around 1970, when, as a newcomer with the production house Nimbus 9, Ezrin travelled to New York City to take a look at rocker Alice Cooper.

"I basically signed them without any authority," Ezrin recalls.

"Then I had to go quickly back to Toronto and beg for my life because the attitude in the office was that they didn't like Alice Cooper."

As fortune would have it, Ezrin ended up playing with Alice Cooper and in 1971, the hit single I'm Eighteen was released.

"Immediately after that… there was a need for another Alice Cooper album and then I got Lou Reed," he says.

"I'm so lucky and I know it."

By 1975, Ezrin recognized there was greater potential to realize his producing dreams south of the border, so he set off to New York.

He later returned to Toronto in 1980, but left again for Los Angeles in 1985.

In between those years, Ezrin worked with many bands and produced some blockbusters, including the classic Pink Floyd album, The Wall.

"[Songwriter] Roger Waters wanted to call all of the shots with The Wall, but because they were stronger as a group, it was my job to diplomatically move him closer to the centre [of the band]," Ezrin reveals.

"A lot of that had to do with Roger trusting me. It was very important that everyone trusted me and that I was somehow able to have a true friendship with every member of the band."

Ezrin explains that as a producer, it's pivotal to respect and cultivate the diverse personalities and creative geniuses of band members.

"One thing you have to be careful not to do is impose a style or concept on a band," he says.

"In my career, I've been put with artists who have distinct personalities and my job is to remind them that this is what they've done. Inside, there is a spark of genius and I hold that up for them to see like a mirror and say, 'Look, this is you and it's brilliant. Let's make sure everything you do is that good.'"

As well as the people side of things, Ezrin notes he's attained much success as a result of his ingenuity with music technology.

"I was one of the first people to use computer sequencing in the studio," he says, adding that he also helped pioneer the digital revolution.

His technical machinations have led to a number of business ventures, including the founding of 7th Level, a computer software company that put out CD ROMs, and the Internet radio provider Enigma Digital.

Passionately community spirited, Ezrin is involved with several charitable initiatives, including Mr. Holland's Opus Foundation, which supports music education and provides kids with instruments, and Music Rising, which gives instruments to those who lost them during Hurricane Katrina and helps these musicians get their careers restarted.

Now that he's back in Toronto with his wife Jan, Ezrin hopes to groom homegrown talent.

"I'm starting a new company in partnership with some other internationally experienced and successful people who happen to live in Toronto, and it will be dedicated to the development of the next generation of artists," he says, noting the company is still in its planning stages.

Though his trip down the road of rock 'n' roll has taken him to many places, clearly, Ezrin is happy to be home.

"Canadians are embracing me," he says.

"It feels like when your parents call you up and say they're proud of you. It's just fantastic."

Film chronicles brain-damaged man's progress

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Braindamadj'd...Take II is a reminder that anyone's life can change irrevocably in an instant. It's also a testimonial to the power of the will.

The documentary, which premieres on CBC Newsworld March 14, is an achingly intimate chronicle of how one young man, severely brain damaged in a car accident, defied the medical prognosis.

Almost 12 years ago, Montrealer Paul Nadler, then 30, hitched a ride in Egypt, hoping to get to Sharm al-Sheikh for some scuba diving. In a freak accident, he was thrown from the car and left for dead in the desert. He was found unconscious, without clothes or identification, by UN troops and taken to an Egyptian hospital, and soon after transferred to the Soroka Medical Center in Be'er Sheva, Israel.

The comatose Nadler was given only a five per cent chance of surviving, and if he did, doctors said he would likely recover little of his physical and mental capabilities. Nadler was a television director, best known for making videos for Musique Plus. He is described as having been a brash free spirit, a risk-taker, who loved exotic travel, challenging sports and being with friends, including many women. He had an energy and drive that sometimes overwhelmed colleagues.

All that was lost when the frontal lobe of his brain was smashed.

His quietly determined mother Vera refused to give up on her son, and brought him back to Montreal, to Notre-Dame Hospital. But the doctors here were not more optimistic. Vera and Nadler's father, Arie, convinced the professionals to keep Nadler alive, and stimulated him themselves by playing music and telling him stories. Seven weeks after the accident, he came out of the coma. He recognized his parents, but little else remained of the old Paul.

Paul Nadler expresses the rage and loneliness associated with his long rehabilitation from traumatic brain injury in a solo performance he created.

Braindamadj'd includes footage of the early days of his rehabilitation that spares nothing of Nadler's reduced being. His paralysis was so extensive that he had to be strapped into his wheelchair to stay upright. He stared vacantly and drooled. He had double vision and slurred speech.

But more disturbing than the physical was the change in his persona. He had lost all sense of what was socially appropriate and of judgment; he was prone to angry outbursts and had acquired a maniacal laugh. He was anxious, impulsive and paranoid. He had virtually no short-term memory and couldn't follow instructions.

Very slowly, Nadler began to walk again with a cane, but he refused to adjust to "the new you" that doctors and therapists told him he had to accept. He was told that the progress he had made already surpassed expectations and he would have to adapt permanently to his limitations.

"There was no way I was going to be a vegetable. There was no possibility that I would not talk or move as long as I have my spirit," Nadler says in the film.

His stubbornness probably saved Nadler from living the rest of his life in an institution. Perhaps because his judgment was impaired, he refused to believe he'd never rollerblade again, have a good job and form normal relationships.

His mother took him home, but she recalls in the film that it was, at times, "horrible, a nightmare," because of his behaviour and communication problems.

Two years after the accident, he struck out on his own, finding an apartment, and almost defiantly, one three floors up a winding staircase.

His problems were many, besides restricted mobility and a mind that didn't work the way it used to: he lost friends and people stared at him on the street. He was frustrated and down on himself. "I got tired of apologizing," he says.

For someone who was so gregarious, hardest of all has been the social isolation and lack of intimate relationships.

He and his mother also had to fight for support, going to court, for example, to get an insurance company to pay for a plastic roof on the motorized scooter he uses.

Over the years, Nadler started to resume something resembling a normal life: he went snowboarding and rock-climbing in California, all miraculous achievements.

He went back to school, five years after the accident, to the Université du Québec à Montréal for a master's degree in communications. There he created a solo performance in which he shared his painful rehabilitation through words and movement.

Braindamadj'd, which has an edgy artistic style, is narrated by Nadler, who exhibits a self-deprecating, ironic humour, and includes interviews with his neurologists and rehabilitation therapists, as well as family and friends. One of his neurologists says: "About five per cent of patients [with traumatic brain injury] do more than is expected. Paul is part of that group."

There is a surprise ending to Braindamadj'd that Nadler and producer Jonathan Finkelstein of Apartment 11 Productions have asked previewers to keep secret. It can be said that it is a happy outcome in keeping with the film's theme of triumphing over the odds, or what Nadler calls "defining my own limits."

Nadler said in an interview that he hopes the film will raise awareness of traumatic brain injury and challenge assumptions about its victims. Even for those who are not touched by anything so serious, Nadler said he hopes anyone can find inspiration in it. "Don't be afraid to ask for that raise, or to ask that girl for a date."

As for Nadler, his battle to control his own destiny is ongoing. His next goal is to convince authorities to let him have his driver's licence back – and his search continues for someone to share his life with.

Braindamadj'd is being shown as part of CBC Newsworld's new The Lens series, which features innovative personal documentaries by independent Canadian filmmakers. It will be aired March 14 and 18 at 10 p.m., 1 a.m. and 4 a.m. EST.

Israeli slalom skier Renzhin finishes in top half

By SHIMRIT BERMAN
Jerusalem Post

TURIN, Italy — As the Winter Olympics wound down, the last day of the alpine skiing events was a real celebration. The excitement of the last moments of the Olympics was felt everywhere, as thousands of fans filled the small ski resort of Sestriere, enjoying food, music and the men's slalom competition.

Even the athletes blended with the crowd between the first and the second run. Michael Renzhin, the last Israeli athlete still in Turin – the two ice-dance teams had already left for the United States – completed his last competition and finished in 38th place. His total time after two runs stood at two minutes and 0.73 seconds, 17.59 seconds back of the gold-medal winner, Benjamin Raich of Austria, who also won the giant slalom title.

"I said it before – my goal was to be inside the top 30," Renzhin said after the race, which was held in difficult conditions with snow falling all day long. "So that's pretty close, I guess it was all right. I could have gone faster in my second run.

"I'm still happy with it because many people didn't even finish the race as it was such a hard course. I managed to do it because I kept my concentration."

Many skiers didn't make it down icy course

Renzhin, 28, wrapped a respectable performance for Israel's first Olympic skiing appearance, managing to finish both his races, something many skiers didn't do, and placing inside the top half of competitors in both competitions.

"I got the experience of skiing on hard courses here," he said, summarizing his first Olympics, "and also the feeling of the kind of pressure there is on you in a competition like that."

Aside from Renzhin making personal and national history, the race itself provided a few surprises. Almost a third of the competitors – 30 athletes – did not finish the first run. Among them were the Italian favourite for the gold medal, Giorgio Rocca, and American headline maker, Bode Miller, who returned home without any Olympic medal.

Another American, Ted Ligety, who won an alpine ski gold medal in the first week of the games, was disqualified. Finland's Kalle Palander, who was in second place after the first run, didn't finish the second one and made way for Austria to conquer the podium, with three medalists: Raich won the gold, Reinfried Herbst won the silver and Reiner Schoenfelder took the bronze, edging Kentaro Minagawa of Japan and Sweden's Andre Myhrer by a mere three-hundredths of a second.

Renzhin received vocal support from the crowd, who cheered loudly for all competitors from countries where skiing is uncommon, including Israel and even more exotic locales like Senegal and Madagscar.

There were few Israelis in the 9,000-seat stands, but Israeli delegation officials waved an Israeli flag to show their support for Renzhin.

The skiers had very little time to rest. After Saturday night's closing ceremonies most returned to the competition circuit. Renzhin himself competes this week in Slovakia.

He was given the honour of carrying the Israeli flag during the closing ceremony. "I'm very excited about it," he said beforehand. "Maybe even more than the actual competition. I've never done anything like that before."

Doctor putting together Israeli women's hockey team

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Esther Silver came to the game of hockey kind of late in life compared to most hockey players.

Eight years ago, at 45, the Toronto doctor strapped on a set of blades and ventured onto the ice for some competitive shinny.

She was immediately hooked. She loved just about everything about the sport, so much so that she wants other women, particularly Israeli women, to take it up as well.

Last May, Sergei Matin, the Russian-born oleh who serves as president of the Israeli hockey federation, asked her to organize a women's league and to develop a team that could represent Israel in international competitions.

Like the other hockey enthusiasts trying to build hockey in Israel, Silver hopes her love of the game will pay dividends in the Middle East. Women in Canada and the United States have recently taken to the sport in a big way – it's the fastest growing sport in North America, she said – so why can't Israeli women do the same?

There are already lots of young women playing outdoor roller hockey in Israel, and coupled with the smaller number of girls playing ice hockey in Metulla on Israel's northern border with Lebanon, the nucleus is there for a national program, Silver asserts.

Silver, who lived in Israel from 1969 to 1988 and plans to move back, believes there are already four or five Israeli women who could play at an international level, say the International Ice Hockey Federation's Division IV, the entry point to international women's hockey.

Esther Silver

In addition, there are a handful of women playing college hockey in Canada and the United States at the varsity level who could represent Israel, if they meet the IIHF's residency requirements. A team like that could compete with New Zealand's national women's team, a squad she has played against as a member of the Canadian Moose during an exhibition tour.

Silver also plays goalie for a men's team in the Ontario Hydro League as well as for the D'Oh Boys, a team in B'nai Brith's D Division.

Silver, who lectures on psychological therapy for adolescents and on parenting, gets on the ice four or five times a week. She began her hockey adventure when she signed up to play in a women's hockey league at Chesswood Arena. She liked playing in the net and improved her skills by attending the hockey school run by one-time Soviet goaltending legend Vladislav Tretiak.

She now wears number 20 in homage to her hockey mentor, and she's come to appreciate the sport in a way many Canadian men do.

"It's a great team sport," she said. "It allows people to relieve tension" and it creates a kind of camaraderie many women appreciate. She feels women like her are "hungry" for the game.

Silver, who was in Metulla recently for a friendly tournament, will go back in the summer for a hockey camp run by former Montreal Canadiens' coach Jean Perron, who coaches Israel's senior and junior teams.

"The women will have a camp within a camp," she said, adding it will take at least one year to pull together a national team.

Late-life romance – not always easy

By MICHAEL GORDON

Sam was not happy. He was in the office with his two children to review his Parkinson's disease and angina. He had made the appointment to assess the results of modified treatments for both conditions. He had less chest pain and was walking better, and everyone should have been happy.

The Senior Side of Life

However, during the conversation, the name Sophie came up, and from the children's facial expression and the pain in Sam's voice, it was clear that something was wrong.

Sam had wanted Sophie, his "girlfriend," to attend the appointment, because they spent most of their time together, even though they each had their own apartment.

He told me – and he was clearly also trying to impress his children: "We really like each other, and for me it is like being born again… but my kids are not happy. They don't think she is refined enough, not like their mother, my late wife, who I loved very much."

I could see from the children's expressions that this was a source of consternation. I told them I could not become a family counsellor, but could perhaps suggest that they get help from a third party, such as a social worker. I told them I could arrange such a visit and they agreed to get back to me.

Late-life romance can be very complicated for everyone involved, including the couple who may be charting waters they thought they would never be interested in or able to navigate again.

For children, there may be many personal conflicts to contend with, including personal, familial and financial issues. Sometimes the children may sense something in the relationship that concerns them, and they react in an attempt to protect their beloved parent. Sometimes they react for what would have to be interpreted as selfish reasons or the inability to appreciate the fact that their parent may want and need to engage in a romantic relationship.

It has been well established that an older person may seek, experience, enjoy and benefit from romantic relationships. Yet, it is understandable that children may have difficulty coming to terms with a new person in their family who may interfere with their relationship with their parent.

The challenge for children is to remember that, just as they, in their lives, pursued their romantic relationships, at times without the full agreement of their parents or siblings, their parent has no less a right to do so for himself or herself. If not handled well, opposition to a parent's romantic pursuit can lead to terrible alienation of the family in the future, the last thing a loving family would want.

If there are indeed indications that the object of their parent's romantic desire has some ulterior motive that the children are aware of, it behooves them to let their parent know in as non-confrontational a manner as possible and, if deemed necessary, find ways to protect the parent or at least the parent's assets, should the worst fears prove to be real.

If, on the other hand – and this is the more common scenario – the relationship is the foundation for a loving expansion and enhancement of their parent's life, then the children should be pleased that such good fortune has befallen their beloved parent. Loneliness is terrible, and even the most caring children cannot make up for the absence of an emotional and physical soul mate, one with whom important personal and intimate experiences can be shared.

The challenge for children is to acknowledge and support the efforts and desires of their parents to seek and enjoy, if they so wish, a romantic extension of their lives. They deserve it.

Purim Snowpea-Citrus Salad with Poppyseed Dressing

Poppy seeds at Purin have a special significance. Tradition holds that Queen Esther chose a vegetarian diet including various seeds, rather than eat non-Kosher food in the King's palace.

2 cups fresh snow-peas, ends snapped off
1 cup whole red seedless grapes
1 cup fresh orange sections (2 large oranges)
1 cup fresh grapefruit sections (2 grapefruits)
1 green bell pepper, cut in julienne slices
1 small red onion, sliced into thin slivers
1/2 cup dry-roasted sunflower seeds

1 bottle poppyseed dressing

Combine snow-peas, grapes, orange sections, grapefruit sections, green pepper slices, onion slivers, sunflower seeds in large bowl. Toss salad with 1/2-3/4 cup poppyseed dressing, or to taste.

Epi on Education

Are we engaging in true talmud Torah?

Some of us who pray on a regular basis have the advantage of knowing the poetry of the siddur deep in our hearts. Of course, there is also the danger that the words become clichés – over-used, abused, and taken for granted in what Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel called religious behaviourism.

Those who don't pray are missing the rhythms of Jewish liturgy in our daily lives, but they have the opportunity to see the prayers of the Jewish people in a fresh light, one that no longer shines for regular synagogue folk.

This thought occurred to me the other day in synagogue as I repeated a line I have said thousands of times, but only then took real notice of.

In the morning service on both weekdays and Shabbat, we refer to an epiphany of Isaiah as he recounted it in Chapter 2 of his book. He envisioned the angels praising God by calling him "Holy, Holy, Holy," an act that was embellished by the rabbis in their version of the same event, which eventually became part of our daily prayers.

"They all accept the rule of the kingdom of heaven, one from the other, granting permission to one another to hallow their Creator."

I realized that, as esoteric as this description is, it is yet another way of describing the act of education. In the same way that we are to imitate God in our limited, earthly fashion, so, too, can we see ourselves as imitating the angels (as it were, our rabbis would add).

We accept God's value system one from the other, lover from beloved, spouse from spouse, child from parents, neighbour from neighbour, teacher from student – and in so doing, we give permission to praise the One who created this universe for us.

Education as acceptance of responsibility and license to praise and thank is a very different notion of teaching and learning than the one we acquire from traditional schooling. It may just be that authentic talmud Torah is not Jewish education as we presently know it.

Time does not stand still

Recently, I was a guest at a bar mitzvah, one I attended with great pleasure knowing that many of my friends and loved ones would be there. I would be surrounded with familiarity, and this always intrigues me.

URBAN WRITER

Upon arrival, I immediately noticed some people in attendance I hadn't crossed paths with in more than 20 years. (I am amazed whenever I hear or read myself making such statements, as it is clear my history is getting longer). Walking into the hall, it became evident that time does not stand still.

One woman, whom I recall as being adorable in stature and look, had her cute appearance mugged by time. She had morphed into a bubbie and was indeed happy with the persona that comes with it, relaying stories about her grandchildren and stating, "I would be fine if my daughter didn't take them [her grandchildren] home at the end of the day."

I saw a man at the simchah whom I remember as being effervescent in nature. For some reason, the years had dulled his shine and he looked rather tired; his spark had been used up for now and needed to flicker rather than flash. Somewhere in his eyes, however, I detected that warm embrace he was so well known for, and as we parted ways, I sensed, hoped, it would resurface as the years roll on and the time is right.

It was marvellous to meet up with an old friend, someone who had clearly "found himself" with the passing of time. Whereas once this middle-aged fellow would consistently fidget, and find it next to impossible to look into another person's eyes, he was now smiling broadly and a certain comfort was etched into his face. His childlike curiosity was endearing as he authentically asked me poignant questions about my life. Time has been good to him.

It was a true thrill to catch up with a rabbi I had known from my high school days.

This rabbi is a Talmud chacham (a wise scholar) and expressed a look that only a wise man can. He appeared to be youthful, like a 20-year-old versus men of retirement age, and he stood tall and earnest, as though he was in a constant state of wonderment about the people and activities occurring around him. There was glow about him. He seemed to have gotten something that a lot of us miss.

The simchah was classy and earthy. I enjoyed it so much as it gave me the chance to celebrate and reconnect with so many friends and family.

The night also taught me that time does not stand still and that we are changing from moment to moment, in ways that are difficult to see as they happen. But when I stood back, and took the room in, and really looked at this crowd of people that make up my world, it was blatantly evident that we do not remain nubile children only concerned with the number of gears on our bike or where to find a bigger hill to ski down.

In fact, the many experiences that we go through – the highs and the lows – attach themselves to our essence; show themselves through the wrinkles on our faces and our slowed gait. However, this in itself, aging, growing, is a trophy, and if it had a plaque on, it would read: "Well done for discovering the means to get through the challenges; for smiling widely when the good times passed through; for fighting off the pain and suffering, ensuring that your happiness is victorious."

The bar mitzvah was beautiful because a boy became a man, and because a man recognized that he was.

Celebrate – and be resolute!

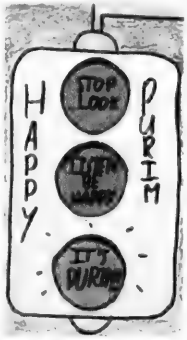
Editorial

It is that time of year, thankfully, when we once again take our cue from our children. As the creators of the artwork on this page, Brodie Kirsh and Eli Minkowitz, remind us, we need to: Stop. Look. Listen. Be happy.

Purim is just around the calendar corner.

In five days, we will be celebrating one of the great survival stories of antiquity.

And, as our sages decreed some two millennia ago, the annual celebration of Purim must be an unreservedly happy occasion.



Eli Minkowitz, Grade 4

It is a religious and historical commemoration comprising four positive parts. We are obliged to:

- listen to the reading of the Scroll of Esther,
- provide some manner of relief or charity to the needy,
- exchange portions of food with members of the community, and
- enjoy a festive meal..

It is not hard to see why the sages would have ordained the performance of these four specific activities to constitute the fulfilment of the religious aspects of the holiday of Purim.

They foster feelings of community.

Together, the acts are aimed at instilling interest in and concern for one another's needs, caring for one another, sharing with one another, understanding that the fate of all often rests with the fate of one and that the fate of one should always be the concern of all.

The Scroll of Esther tells how our fears for our future were assuaged by resolute, bold action by the few and collective, determined action by the many. It is an eerie irony of Purim this year, engendering new fears for our future, that the modern-day descendant of the villain Haman, Iranian President Ahmad Ahmadinejad, repeatedly, noisily, pathologically "seeks to destroy the Jews." (Esther 3:6)

The News in Brief

CANADA

Kirpan Ruling Praised

TORONTO — Both Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada praised last week's unanimous Supreme Court ruling overturning a Quebec court's ban against Sikh students wearing ceremonial daggers to school. The judgment upheld the right to wear the kirpans, subject to limits to ensure "a reasonable level of safety." CJC president Ed Morgan said the ruling "reaffirmed that freedom of religion is a fundamental value." Allan Adel, chair of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights, added that such rights are crucial, "as long as they are balanced against other fundamental rights, including the right to safety and security."

Pesach Food to Cuba

TORONTO — Ontario Jews sent kosher for Pesach food to Cuba's 1,500 Jews for the 45th straight year on Feb. 27. Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto kept up a tradition that began with the U.S. embargo of the island nation.

Amazon Pulls Book

TORONTO — Amazon.ca, the Canadian arm of the U.S. online bookstore, has pulled a book by U.S white supremacist David Duke after a complaint by Canadian Jewish Congress. The retailer removed Jewish Supremacism after CJC argued it's hateful and is on a list of material banned by the Canadian Border Services Agency.

WORLD

Mayor Stays On Job

LONDON — A judge last week temporarily blocked London Mayor Ken Livingstone's four-week suspension for comparing a Jewish journalist to a Nazi. The Adjudication Panel for England, which hears complaints against local officials, found him guilty Feb. 24 after a complaint by the Board of Deputies of British Jews. He had appealed the suspension, which was to begin March 1. It came after Livingstone last year asked a critical Jewish reporter from London's Evening Standard if he was a "German war criminal" and said he was acting "like a concentration camp guard." The mayor is a longtime critic of Israel and said that's the real reason for the complaint.

Shoah Real: Khatami

TEHRAN — In an apparent attack on current Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, his predecessor, Mohammed Khatami, called the Holocaust a "massacre of innocent people, among them many Jews," the BBC reported. Khatami, a relative moderate, added that the Shoah occurred, "even if this has been misused and there is enormous pressure on the Palestinian people." He said: "We should speak out if even a single Jew is killed." Ahmadinejad has drawn criticism for repeatedly denying the Shoah. Also last week, Iran pledged $250 million (US) to the Palestinian Authority. Tehran reportedly did so to offset funding lost after Hamas' recent election victory.

Irving Back At It

VIENNA — Convicted Holocaust denier David Irving repeated that Hitler didn't have a systematic plan to exterminate Jews. Speaking from jail in Austria, he told the BBC that Hitler's own involvement in the Shoah is "a big question mark." He added he now believes some Jews were gassed in the war, but doesn't think many people were gassed at Auschwitz, which he says had only two small gas chambers. Irving recently received a three-year term for saying in a speech and interview in Austria in 1989 that Auschwitz had no gas chambers. Both he and prosecutors have appealed.

Not Guilty Plea

MOSCOW — A Russian man suspected of attacking worshippers in a Moscow shul pleaded not guilty last week to attempted murder. Alexander Koptsev, 20, told a judge he's not guilty because the Criminal Code was "written by Jews and the Jewish Mafia." Prosecutors classified the Jan. 11 attack, in which eight people were injured, as attempted murder and attempt to cause injuries because of ethnic or religious hatred. The maximum sentence is life in jail.

Natives, Jews Urged to 'Help Heal the World'

VANCOUVER — Jewish and native leaders discussed residential schools, discrimination and future opportunities for joint dialogue in a recent teleconference convened by the B.C. non-governmental organization Worldviews Strategies.

Led by Canadian Jewish Congress' Pacific region chair Mark Weintraub and Chief Robert Joseph of the Gwa wa enuk First Nation, the teleconference also included representatives of European and North American social justice NGOs, and the federal and all provincial governments.

Weintraub said Jews and natives "have a deep friendship that stems from common historical narratives, determination and hope in the face of pervasive and institutionalized racism and a connection to land that permeates our ancestral culture."

As natural allies, they can work together "to help heal the world," Joseph added.

U.S. 'will always be by Israel's side,' Clinton says

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

The United States' relationship with Israel will be "solid for a long time to come," former U.S. President Bill Clinton told supporters of the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies in Toronto on Sunday night.

"No matter what happens, we will always be there by Israel's side," the 42nd American president told some 1,800 people attending the sold-out Spirit of Hope Benefit at the Toronto Performing Arts Centre.

"We're not about to allow Hamas or anyone else to destroy Israel."

In a 40-minute extemporaneous talk that was warmly received, Clinton touched on many topics, including the Middle East, the growing interdependence of the world, and the deadly riots that followed publication of Danish editorial cartoons depicting the Muslim Prophet Muhammad.

Among those is attendance were Ontario Attorney General Michael Bryant, Toronto Mayor David Miller, federal NDP Leader Jack Layton and Ontario Opposition Leader John Tory.

Clinton said he "sympathized" with the reason Palestinians voted for Hamas in recent parliamentary elections because the average Palestinian is worse off now than a decade ago.

"They cast a vote for something more immediate and tangible. I get that. But that doesn't mean we can ignore a core commitment to terror and the destruction of Israel."

Former U.S. president Bill Clinton [CJN file photo]

Clinton earned applause when he said the west should suspend financial aid to Hamas until it renounces terror and recognizes Israel. Democracy, he said, "is more than about winning a race. It's also about the rule of law, minority rights and the renunciation of extra-legal violence against civilians."

But there's reason for hope, he said.

The former president cited a poll taken one week after the election that showed 73 per cent of Palestinians wanted Hamas to renounce terror and 82 per cent wanted it to make peace with Israel.

"These are big numbers," he said. "Most Palestinian people want to work this out."

Only four per cent wanted sharia law in the territories, he noted.

Hamas' offer to have international humanitarian aid monitored should also be spurned, Clinton said.

"It's like saying, 'I'll spend your money and I'll get somebody else to buy guns and make bombs.' That's a bad deal. I support the position of all governments who decline to participate in this."

The "whole purpose" of the peace process is to guarantee both sides security, and "we can't go down that road unless that's part of the deal."

The truths that we must tell

From the editor's desk

Emmanuel Navon is a senior fellow at the Institute for Policy and Strategy at the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya. He also lectures in the political science department of Tel-Aviv University and has taught public administration at Bar-Ilan University.

He thinks, teaches and writes a great deal about Israel's foreign policy, political philosophy, international economy, terrorism and the media.

Soon to be published by the Institute for Policy and Strategy are his The War of Ideas Over the Arab-Israeli Conflict: A Guide to Israel's Advocates (with Rahel Machtiger), and Soft Powerlessness: Arab Propaganda and the Erosion of Israel's International Standing.

In his writings, Navon reflects on the success of the malevolent, anti-Israel campaign of propaganda that has been cleverly waged throughout the world in the past decades but especially in this very young 21st century.

The success of that campaign, alas, is most painfully wounding on campuses in Europe and North America, albeit perhaps, not as sharply on the campuses in Canada. A recent study by Hillel in the United States, for example, found that advocating for Israel was the least popular cause among Jewish youth on American campuses.

A working paper of Navon's theories concerning the success of Arab propaganda and the erosion of Israel's international standing was distributed at the Herzliya Conference this past January. It was written before the victory by Hamas in January in the general Palestinian elections. But the international reaction to Hamas' electoral victory has been very instructive and an unhappy confirmation of Navon's conclusions.

Completely disregarding or explaining away Hamas' hallowed, hard-core purpose of destroying the Jewish state, as a nettlesome detail of its out-of-date mission statement, some non-Arab countries – Russia, Turkey and South Africa, for example – have already rushed to confer legitimacy upon the regime/political party/terrorists.

News commentators and pundits are so frequently repeating Hamas' "demands" upon Israel that soon those demands will become the "new norm" in the Middle East debate. They will form a new starting point and a new base of reference in the competing claims of the Mideast conflict. And since Hamas' election came in a thoroughly democratic process, no less so than the democratic processes in Israel, many individuals will simply accept the new norm and Hamas in that norm as a morally and politically equivalent regime to that of the government of Israel.

"The war launched by the PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization] against Israel in September 2000 had two objectives," Navon writes. "To exhaust and demoralize Israeli society… and to invite international pressure and intervention by presenting Israel in the foreign media as the powerful and ruthless aggressor of a powerless and desperate people. The first objective has failed; the second has succeeded – especially in Europe."

With laser precision, Navon dissects, defines and discusses the elements of the anti-Israel propaganda war. He concludes the analysis thus: "When people who are not versed in the history of the Middle East hear lies repeatedly, they start believing them. As [Joseph] Goebbels said, and as the Palestinians understand, 'Propaganda must… always be essentially simple and repetitious… it must confine itself to a few points and repeat them over and over.' Propaganda can be effective only if it is based on spreading and repeating the same disciplined message. Israel should obviously not spread lies and myths but the very opposite: it should repeat the same truths over and over again. Arab propagandists are not embarrassed to lie; Israel advocates should not be embarrassed to tell the truth. It is precisely because Arab spokespersons sound like broken records that they are getting their message across. Pro-Israel activists should do the same with the truth.

"Basic and redundant messages on the Arab-Israel conflict could take as a model the 'Seven Truths' developed by Dr. Tal Ben-Shahar from Harvard University and from the David Project:

Truth 1: Arab rejectionism. The conflict is about Arab rejection of Jewish sovereignty and freedom in the Middle East.

Truth 2: The suffering. The Arab regimes are responsible for the suffering of Israelis and Palestinians alike.

Truth 3: Immoral equivalency. While Israel is committed to democracy and individual freedoms for all its citizens, Arab countries are oppressive dictatorships, disrespectful of basis human rights and guilty of apartheid on the basis of ethnicity, religion and gender.

Truth 4: Population patterns. With the rise of modern Zionism, Jews returning to Israel purchased and cultivated land, attracted mass Arab immigration and improved the living conditions of Jews and Arabs.

Truth 5: Arab anti-Semitism. There can be no peace in the Middle East as long as the regimes, the media, the mosques and the schools incite violence and teach hate.

Truth 6: The need for a Jewish state.

To secure the basic rights of the Jews in the Middle East, Israel must remain a Jewish state.

Truth 7: Making the world a better place. Israel, though constantly forced to fight against those bent on its destruction, focuses on creation, working toward progress and betterment of lives around the world.

These are truths we must all tell.

Canadian gov't urged to make Darfur a priority

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan (CASTS), a grassroots advocacy organization, is urging the Stephen Harper government to make intervention in the Darfur region of Sudan a foreign policy priority.

"We need [Prime Minister] Harper to exercise more forceful leadership internationally to bring an end to the atrocities in Darfur," states a letter to CASTS supporters from Norman Epstein, founder of the organization.

The letter asks CASTS supporters to call on the prime minister, Foreign Minister Peter MacKay and local MPs to use Canada's "international influence to save the people of the Darfur region of Sudan, where genocide has been underway since 2003.

"It is estimated that 350,000-400,000 people have died, 10,000 more continue to die every month and 2.5 million have been displaced," the letter states. "The Janjaweed militias burn and bomb villages, systematically rape women and young girls, abduct children and destroy food and water supplies... Since the Khartoum (Sudan) regime is complicit with the militias, it cannot be relied upon to protect the people of Darfur."

Epstein believes Canada can take a leading role in mobilizing the international community to intervene to save the Darfur refugees, many of whom languish in camps in neighbouring Chad.

He said he is heartened by a recent statement by U.S. President George Bush, who called for a more "muscular" intervention in the region under United Nations auspices, including a bigger role for NATO. And he pointed to developments at the UN, where the Security Council directed Secretary General Kofi Annan on Feb. 3 to begin contingency planning to turn the 7,000-man African Union (AU) force into a UN force double that size.

The AU force is not equipped or trained to protect the refugees displaced by the Khartoum-supported militias, Epstein stated.

Meanwhile, the Washington Post reported that four U.S. military planners were sent to the UN to assist in organizing military options for the AU forces on the ground. The move came after Bush, who has called the atrocities in Darfur "genocide," concluded peace talks were going nowhere and the AU force was unable to protect refugees.

Around the same time, two U.S. senators, Republican Sam Brownback and Democrat Joseph Biden, said they planned to introduce a resolution in Congress calling for NATO troops to help the AU stop the killing in Darfur.

Sudan, however, opposes expanded international intervention. The New York Times reported Sudan is lobbying other countries to oppose replacing the AU force with UN troops, including a veiled threat of an Al Qaeda attack on UN soldiers in Sudan if they come.

Even possible UN sanctions are being resisted by three key states: China, Russia and Qatar, all members of the Security Council.

Epstein said "there's a realization that current policy has not accomplished much... Canada certainly has to do more to be forceful in ensuring intervention happens."

Epstein said he expected broad political support for Canadian involvement in an intervention force, adding Canada's contribution might be limited to several hundred soldiers and logistical support.

CASTS is urging the federal government to use its influence to urge the UN to invoke Chapter 7, a mandatory resolution that would authorize the use of force to disarm the Janjaweed; as an alternative, CASTS is encouraging Canada's support for an international military force with the mandate to disarm militias.

Epstein suggested one of the lessons of the Rwandan genocide was that failure to intervene could lead to regional instability and a spillover of violence to neighbouring countries. He pointed to Congo, a neighbour of Rwanda, where three million have died in sectarian violence.

Western nations, he conceded, were hesitant to send their soldiers into harm's way in Rwanda. When 10 Belgian soldiers were killed, "Western nations retreated.

"We need a paradigm shift," he continued. "We need to make up our mind as an international community to intervene.

"Are we going to sit back and allow defenseless civilians to be slaughtered? If we are, we have to ask, what kind of humanity do we represent if we abdicate our responsibility to protect the weak?"

Family of Alicia Ross lends her name to fundraiser

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When her daughter, Alicia Ross, went missing last summer, the people of Thornhill came through for Sharon Fortis in uncounted ways.

Now, Fortis and her husband, Julius, want to give something back to the community that supported them.

On March 11, the Fortis family will join the family of Greg Rogers, Ross' onetime boyfriend who died in an accident in 1999, to sponsor the second annual Greg Rogers Memorial Hockey Game.

Rogers played for the Thornlea Thunder when he was a student at Thornlea Secondary School. The game, between Thornlea Thunder alumni, and York Regional Police, will be followed by a post-game Monte Carlo fun night. Proceeds from the events will help fund a scholarship named for Alicia Ross and Greg Rogers, which goes to college and university students who hail from Thornhill.

Response to the fundraiser has been remarkable, Fortis told The CJN. The game, which begins at 5 p.m. at Thornhill Community Centre (Bayview and Green Lane) is almost sold out, she said, 10 days before the puck drops.

The post-game fun night at Le Parc (8432 Leslie St.) begins at 7 p.m. and features a buffet dinner, charity Monte Carlo and other entertaining events.

Fortis said sponsors have been generous in providing prizes for the auction and silent auction. Participants will be issued "funny money" to play the various games, and the money can be used to bid on prizes such as Toronto Raptors and Toronto Maple Leafs memorabilia, restaurant meals and shopping coupons.

The Raptors, she said, have donated a package that includes a tour of the team's dressing room, the opportunity to shoot hoops in a pre-game warm-up and platinum tickets.

Fortis said the fundraiser "started out small" but quickly took off. She was approached by the Rogers family and by Phil Barski and Ron Kuperberg, two of Alicia's and Greg's friends. Alicia was part of the committee last year that organized the first memorial game, and the organizers hoped that the Fortises would participate in the 2006 version.

The Fortises agreed, and once they lent Alicia's name to the event, "It just got insane," she said.

Fortis said that when Alicia's death was confirmed about a month after she went missing, people who had volunteered to help "were in limbo." When the fundraiser was announced, "people said 'Yes, now we can help.'"

Alicia's scholarship will be allocated by Fortis and her husband to a candidate based on criteria other than marks, she continued. Key factors will be a strong work ethic, dedication to the community and whether the student had to overcome an obstacle.

"We're looking for a person who falls between the cracks, a diamond in the rough," she said.

For more information about the scholarship or the fundraising event, visit www.aliciaross.ca or www.grsf.ca.

Jews urged: Be 'vocal locals'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Members of the Jewish community should actively challenge unbalanced media coverage of Israel, says the senior foreign press co-ordinator of the Israeli Prime Minister's Office.

Urging Jews to be "vocal locals," David Baker said, "You can help us by challenging media bias and distortions."

In a recent talk at Beth Shalom Synagogue, Baker, in his third visit to Toronto in 16 months, set out steps on how to file a complaint about unfair reporting.

Phone an editor at a newspaper and explain the grievance, but do not engage in media bashing, "which is the worst thing you can do," he advised.

Contribute original articles to the local media, write letters to the editor, and use the resources of the Israeli consulate, Baker added.

The international media has an "insatiable but legitimate appetite" for Israeli news, he said, adding that, for journalists, Israel is a goldmine.

According to Baker, Israel's prominence in the media outweighs its size: Some 400 foreign correspondents are based in Israel, and only Washington and Moscow have bigger press corps.

One thousand reporters poured into Israel to cover Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's incapacitating stroke on Jan. 4, and as many as 2,000 arrived to cover Operation Defensive Shield in the West Bank in the spring of 2002, Baker said.

During Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Gaza last summer, reporters received unprecedented access to almost everything they requested, he pointed out.

Baker acknowledged that "biased" reporters covering Israel are in a minority, but he said there are correspondents who have preconceived notions about the Arab-Israeli conflict.

As well, some reporters emphasize Palestinian casualties in the intifadah and virtually ignore the killings of Israelis, he noted.

Still others have a "knee-jerk tendency" to zero in on the "juiciest" or most sensational aspects of a story, while ignoring measures Israel takes to head off terrorism, he observed.

Nevertheless, the vast majority of reporters "know what the score is," and know that it starts and ends with Palestinian terrorism, he claimed.

Baker said Israel craves peace and wants to live in harmony with its Arab neighbours.

Describing Canada as "a valued friend," Baker said, "We share common values. We're very good friends and enjoy a healthy relationship."

School boards limit access to controversial book

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

School boards in Ottawa, Windsor and Niagara Region are joining the York Region District School Board in limiting access to a controversial children's book on the Mideast conflict that critics say demonizes Israeli soldiers and glorifies suicide bombers.

The District School Board of Niagara announced last week it had advised teachers, principals and librarians that the book, Three Wishes, Palestinian and Israeli Children Speak, may not be suitable for students in grades 4, 5 and 6. While the book will remain in the district's library inventory, children who request it may find the librarian directing them to other books. The librarian might also inform the student's parents about the book's sensitive contents before providing it, the St. Catharines Standard reported.

In the capital region, meanwhile, the Ottawa-Carleton Catholic School Board decided it would not stock the book and won't make it available to students who request it.

The Greater Essex County District School Board decided to allow the book to remain on library shelves, but it's restricting access to it to students in Grade 7 and up. David Lynn, superintendent of education for the Windsor-area board, told the Windsor Star "some of the comments [in Three Wishes] would be somewhat disturbing to a student who doesn't understand the context of what the children in Israel and Palestine are experiencing."

The country's largest board, the Toronto District School Board, announced it is considering a recommendation that would require students in grades 4 and 5 to present a parent's note indicating they are aware their child would like to read Three Wishes. The book would remain available without a note to students in Grade 6.

The moves came after Canadian Jewish Congress distributed a letter to school boards across the province raising concerns that Three Wishes is inappropriate for youngsters in grades 4 through 6.

The book is one of 10 non-fiction nominees offered to students by the Ontario Library Association (OLA) as part of the prestigious Silver Birch Award recreational reading program. The books in the Silver Birch program are not part of school curricula, but are made available to students on a voluntary basis as part of an after-school reading program. Students in grades 4 to 6 vote on their favourites at the end of the program.

Three Wishes, by anti-war author Deborah Ellis, is largely based on conversations with Israeli and Palestinian children. Concerns were first raised about the book by York Region teacher Sarah Burakowski, who said it demonizes Israeli soldiers and presents suicide bombing as a viable life choice.

The York Region school board agreed to remove the book from the Silver Birch program, but when concerns were first raised some six weeks ago, the Toronto board said it would not follow suit.

On Feb. 8, Congress sent a letter to the OLA and to school boards in Ontario outlining in detail its concerns about passages in the book – particularly the background and contextual material provided by Ellis. The letter said, "we do not believe that this particular book will serve to advance student comprehension in any meaningful way" but may serve "only to demonize both sides as murderous and irrational."

In one passage, a Palestinian girl, Wafa, 12, said, "Killing an Israeli will make me feel glad. It will make me feel strong."

She added: "I am tired of them making me feel small and weak. I want to feel strong and proud."

Another Palestinian girl, Maryam, 11, said "there are women martyrs who do the suicide bombings. They are very brave… I have only one wish. I would like to go to heaven. Maybe in heaven there is happiness after we die. Maybe then."

Salam, the 12-year-old sister of suicide bomber Aayat Al-Akhras, who killed herself, a security guard and 17-year-old Rachel Levy at a Jerusalem market, said she would have made her sister a special breakfast on the day of her attack, had she known about it.

Len Rudner, director of community relations for Congress, said, "I think we have made some progress… We don't go in there with unreasonable positions. Boards see us as partners rather than as adversaries."

Finding courage in community

A world without Zionism seems to be Ahmadinejad's key foreign policy objective. He encourages, supports, instructs and funds terrorists to kill Jews. And, of course, he is desperate to build nuclear weapons with which he would try to wipe out the Jewish state.

On the Perspectives page in this issue, Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz tells of the newly formed Coalition on Iran, an ad hoc group of activists worried about the dangerous regime in Iran.

Just as Mordechai in his day urged Esther "not to remain silent," Rabbi Steinmetz in our day urges readers of The CJN not to remain silent, to come together in defence of the sovereign Jewish state's right to live, to become involved in communal efforts to stop Ahmadinejad "before it is too late."

Strong currents of anti-Israel and anti-Semitic sentiments are coursing through the Middle East and even through parts of the West. Jews will have to withstand the inevitable shocks. We have done so in the past, as the Scroll of Esther chronicles. And we must do so now, in the manner in which the Scroll of Esther teaches us.

In performing the four community-building mitzvot that the rabbis decreed for this joyous holiday, we feel with, for and part of the Jewish people. And as part of this remarkably achieving, remarkably engaged, ancient-modern people, we find courage too, for as Mordechai also told Esther, "relief and deliverance will surely come."

Even as Jewish communities across the world, and especially in Israel, prepare to withstand the inevitable attempts to inflict harm upon our people, we must also turn our attention to those rabbinically encoded cues from our happily insistent children.

Stop. Look. Listen. Be happy. It's Purim.

Correction

Two assertions in the editorial last week (March 2), The issue of fairness, were incorrect.

We wrote that Ontario is the only jurisdiction in Canada that refuses to extend any funding to non-Catholic, faith-based schools. But this is also the case in the Atlantic provinces.

We also wrote that non-Catholic, faith based schools seek funding only for the general, non-religious portion of their schools' program.

However, after the editorial was published, The CJN was advised that the coalition for fair funding of non-Catholic, faith-based schools is indeed seeking funding treatment from the government of Ontario equal to that of the Catholic schools.

25 years ago in The CJN

• Quebec unveiled a plan to sensitize the province's francophone majority to the needs of Quebec's ethnic and anglophone communities, and to create a rapprochement between the groups. The goal was integration, not assimilation, said Jaques-Yvan Morin, minister of cultural and scientific development.

• Recently released Soviet Refusenik Iosif Mendelevich made a surprise visit to a Canadian Mizrachi convention in Jerusalem. He was greeted with tears, applause and singing.

Day school system in crisis

It has been recently asserted by community officials that Jewish education in Toronto is thriving. The assertions were that enrolment is on the increase and that more than 50 per cent of the Jewish community is involved. Unfortunately, the failure to make a distinction between supplementary and day-school education streams renders these statements dangerously misleading. While each stream has an important place in the structure of our community, all is definitely not well with Jewish education in Toronto.

The day school system in Toronto, our most effective promoter of Jewish continuity, is in a state of crisis. Fees are poised to cross the five-digit mark this year for elementary schools, not to speak of high schools. Non-wealthy families who persevere find themselves under increasing economic strain, while others opt out or are turned off from even considering day school education (thereby increasing the numbers in supplementary schools). Consequently, several day schools are suffering from declining enrolment. Complicating matters is the utter refusal of the Ontario government to acknowledge the long-standing inequity in educational funding in this province. All of this points to a situation that is in dire need of a remedy.

Statements that cloud these issues promote complacency about the current state of the day school system. This only delays the urgent communal action that is required to work toward solving this festering problem, which seriously threatens our community's continuing strength into future generations.

Futile to negotiate with Hamas

The Islamic terrorist organization Hamas, an arm of Sheik Ahmad Yassin's Islamic Association, had its beginnings in the late 1970s as part of an Israeli attempt to encourage the rise of a religious alternative to the Palestine Liberation Organization. It was a group devoted to benevolence (with Israeli funding), and adopted a slow approach to Islamization of the region through rhetorical battle and indoctrination. The Islamic Association graduated from benevolence to terror as Yassin forged a new branch, named Hamas, devoted to undermining the peace process with suicide bombings of civilian targets.

As fundamentalism began to ferment within Hamas, extremism ruled. It was in charge of most Palestinian educational and social-aid institutions, and it spoon-fed ideas of hatred and destruction along with Pablum to children in nurseries and grade schools.

The group has created an anti-Western society and is a strong adherent of sharia law. In the short time since the Palestinian legislative elections, it has eliminated some of the rights that women enjoy in democracies. It also released more than 50 prisoners from an international prison in Jericho, many of whom were incarcerated for murder. With Hamas' benevolent indoctrination and the swindling ways of the previous Fatah government, it was easy for Hamas to be democratically elected.

It would be futile to negotiate with enemies who are intractable in their determination to destroy Israel. Hopefully, the United Nations and the European Union will not again become emasculated appeasers.

Group opposes Israeli government policies

The lives of Jewish Canadians, as well as the lives of Israelis, have been adversely affected by the policies of various governments of Israel. Despite growing international opposition to these policies, Israel continues to pursue a primarily military strategy while claiming to speak in the name of Jewish people around the world. Jewish Canadians have not been given an opportunity to discuss these issues, nor have we been able to make our views known, except for media, groups and committees that have been marginalized.

It is time for those of us who have a different vision to come forward publicly to present our views. We need to explain to the Canadian government that Jewish Canadians do not speak with one voice about current Israeli policies and that thousands have grave doubts that until now have been muted. We have joined together to create a cross-Canada alliance of Jewish anti-occupation forces prepared to present our position within Canada's Jewish community and before the general public.

Canadians, especially Jewish Canadians, seeking a peaceful resolution to the Israel-Palestinian conflict should no longer remain silent in the face of Israel's actions in the occupied territories. Israel is taking over increasing amounts of land that the Oslo accords had envisaged for the creation of a Palestinian state. Though declared illegal by the International Court of Justice, the separation barrier continues to encroach on Palestinian municipalities, thereby making the creation of a viable Palestinian state impossible.

We urge Jewish Canadians to take a greater role in supporting and promoting a peaceful and just resolution to the conflict.

Stand up to a modern Haman

By RABBI CHAIM STEINMETZ

Rabbi Steinmetz is a monthly columnist with The CJN. Because of the importance of this essay, we depart from our normal practice of not printing essays by our regular columnists.

It seems that the most important question on the world stage today is how do we defend civilization against tasteless cartoons? And while the world is busy searching for protection from hazardous drawings, European Union bureaucrats are looking for new ways to revive medieval blasphemy laws.

Jack Natovitch, Grade 2

Unfortunately, the international community is asking the wrong questions, and the answer to two more important ones – would he, and could he? – may change the course of world history.

The "he" I'm talking about is Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

It's easy to dismiss the ultra-conservative Iranian regime led by Ahmadinejad and Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. Their public pronouncements are at times bizarre and ridiculous. Khamenei believes the West is trying to destroy Iran with miniskirts. When a plane crashed in Tehran last December, killing 108, Ahmadinejad said: "But what is important is that they have shown the way to martyrdom which we must follow." And the country's official press agency, IRNA, reported a year-and-a-half ago that a woman in the southeastern Iranian city of Iranshahr "gave birth to a live gray frog accompanied with mud."

Yet the Ahmadinejad regime's bizarre beliefs are precisely why the world must ask the question: would Ahmadinejad use the nuclear weapons his country is thought to be working hard to produce?

Ahmadinejad is drawn to violence. He reportedly started his political career in 1979 as one of the hostage takers at the U.S. Embassy in Tehran (though Iran denies this). When the Tehran stock market plummeted after his election, he told his cabinet, "If we were permitted to hang two or three persons, the problems with the stock exchange would be solved forever." And in his world, the pinnacle of life is death. He constantly extols martyrdom, and once remarked, "Is there art that is more beautiful, more divine and more eternal than the art of martyrdom?"

Ahmadinejad follows a radical theology. He follows an extremist Shiite view that believes in "Mahdaviat," preparing the world for the 12th Mahdi, a saviour who according to Shiite belief will bring the end of times. Mahdaviat is an obsession of Ahmadinejad's. As Tehran's mayor, he built an avenue to welcome the Mahdi, and he has recently allocated $17 million (US) to build a mosque in honour of the Mahdi. When he addressed the United Nations last September, Ahmadinejad ended his speech with a prayer for the coming of the Mahdi.

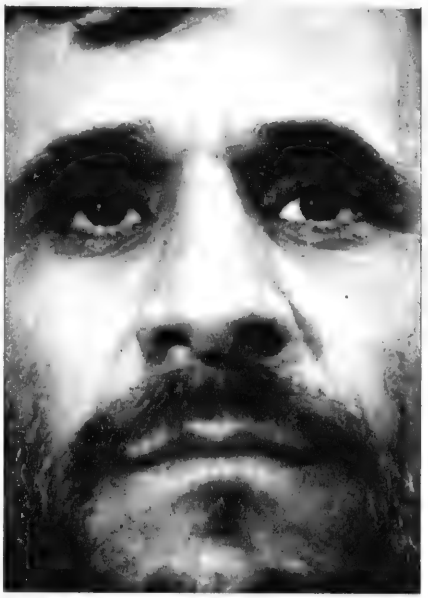
These beliefs are dangerous. As Scott Peterson of the Christian Science Monitor points out, "this presidential obsession with the Mahdaviat yields a certitude that leaves little room for compromise." And of course, preparing for the Mahdi means getting rid of what Ahmadinejad calls "the oppressor world," namely Israel, the United States and the West.

Ahmadinejad hates Jews and Israel. He is the world's most prominent Holocaust denier, and Holocaust denial is now a staple of Iranian media. Recently, Iranian state TV has included "news" reports affirming the veracity of the blood libels and the Protocols of the Elders of Zion. Last December, he sponsored a conference on a "world without Zionism," in which he called for Israel to be "wiped off the map." In addition, he made it clear to the attendees that "this goal is attainable."

Maclean's magazine got it right when it called Ahmadinejad "the scariest man on earth." There is no question that this radical, violent man who hates Israel and the West would not hesitate to use nuclear weapons to achieve his goals. Indeed, a recent report from Iran on the website of the Middle East Media Research Institute, a media watchdog, reports that a new fatwa has been issued by influential Iranian clerics stating that "sharia [Islamic law] does not forbid the use of nuclear weapons."

It's clear that Ahmadinejad would use nuclear weapons. The only question left is could he use them?

Unfortunately, Ahmadinejad may have a nuclear weapon sooner than you think. His government has recently resumed uranium enrichment and will no longer allow snap International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) inspections of its nuclear facilities. And recently, Ali Larijani, the secretary of the Iranian Supreme National Security Council, stated that Iran is already capable of conducting a nuclear reaction. Iran is not all that far away from a nuclear weapon.



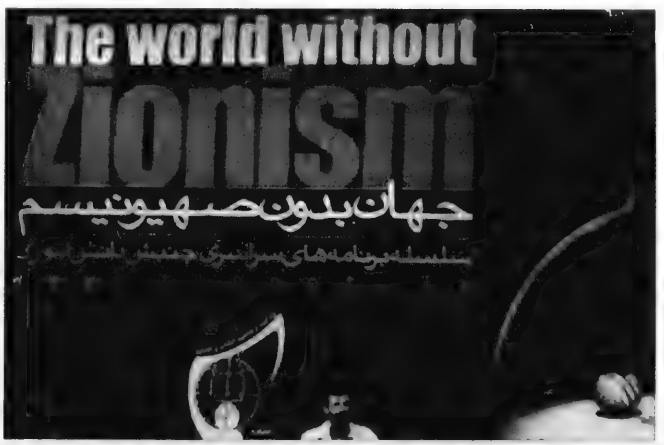
Unquestionably, time is short. Unfortunately, the attention span of most Canadians is even shorter. Much like a pre-9/11 Osama bin Laden, Ahmadinejad is unknown to most Canadians. It's time for us to speak up, create international awareness, and stop the scariest man on earth.

To this end, four concerned activists, Itay Gadot, Rabbi Reuven Poupko, Prof. Gil Troy and I, have formed the Coalition on Iran, an ad hoc group of activists concerned about this dangerous regime. We are organizing rallies on March 14 in cities across Canada. If you are interested in organizing a rally in your community, contact Gadot at info@betar.ca.

On March 14, we celebrate the Jewish holiday of Purim, a day that recalls when another man from Persia, the viceroy Haman, had his plans to destroy the Jews thwarted.

Ahmadinejad is a modern-day Haman. There's no question he would use nuclear weapons to achieve his goals. Let's make sure we stop him now, before it's too late.

Rabbi Steinmetz is spiritual leader of Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem in Montreal



In an eerie echo of the Jew-hater Haman, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has made the destruction of Israel one of his country's key foreign policy objectives.

Getting beyond survival

Torontonian Jim Lederman is the longest-serving foreign correspondent in Jerusalem. He is an astute observer of contemporary politics and a brilliant analyst. In a recent lecture in Jerusalem, he reported on research by the World Values Survey, in which scholars from all over the world, including Canada, are involved.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

The research suggests that focusing on survival often makes us turn a blind eye to corruption, mismanagement, fraud, etc. People who feel threatened are prone to compromise, or ignore altogether, values they normally hold dear. Fear that we may not survive tends to blunt our moral sensibilities.

That is why, in Lederman's understanding, Israeli politicians campaigning ahead of this month's Knesset elections have little to say about such issues as corruption in high places and the alarming rise of poverty in their midst, which are some of the blights on Israeli society. Instead of offering solutions to these and similar issues, they try to frighten voters by declaring how vulnerable Israel's security will become if their opponents win.

That is also why, according to Lederman, ostensibly religious leaders in Israel have been convicted of acting illegally, because they felt that their way of life was being threatened by the secular state. They seem to believe that cutting corners is legitimate when it comes, for example, to diverting state money to their own yeshivot.

The argument doesn't only apply to Israel. The so-called war on terror seems to absolve U.S. President George W. Bush and his allies of dealing with issues such as poverty, pollution, AIDS in Africa, and even state-sponsored torture.

Similarly, when Canadian politicians felt threatened by the prospect of Quebec sovereignty, one of the results was the sponsorship scandal. And in the recent election, party leaders tried to warn the public of all sorts of dangers if their opponents were elected.

I have a particular interest in this research, because for many years I have repeatedly expressed discomfort at the frantic stress on Jewish survival to the virtual exclusion of other urgent issues in Jewish life. My first book (Beyond Survival, 1982) was an attempt to challenge the survivalist formula put forward by the late Emil Fackenheim. Since then, I have written and spoken about the menacing effect of organizations in the Jewish world that seek to frighten us by arguing that we are about to disappear from the face of the earth because of anti-Semitism, assimilation and Arab aggression.

This doesn't mean, of course, that Jewish survival is assured. But it does mean that to make it the principal issue of Jewish concern threatens it because it ignores other Jewish core values. And it doesn't seem to imbue young Jews with loyalty and allegiance, whereas emphasis on Judaism's moral teachings does precisely that.

The only negative thing about going to Dal

My three years in Halifax have been great, and there are few negatives that come to mind when I think of my home away from home.

However, three years of constant travel back and forth from Toronto to Halifax, and vice versa, has distorted my once-glowing perceptions of travelling by airplane.

Matthew Pottens in Halifax

Prior to starting at Dalhousie University, a young Matthew Pottens was absolutely delighted by the thought of flying like a bird thousands of feet above the ground. Now, when I think about flying, I think of injured knees (which I'll explain later), awkward social encounters, constant pain in my ears, and the ever-entertaining taxi drivers who welcome you back to Halifax by driving you home in cabs plagued by the sweet smell of tobacco and whiskey.

Feb. 24 marked the end of Dalhousie's reading week, which meant that Sunday, Feb. 26, was "fly back to Halifax day." I arrived at the airport, said goodbye to my parents, and walked up to the check-in counter. Which leads me to my crucial tip for potential or current Dalhousie students, one that's crucial to ensuring a comfortable flight: request a seat in the emergency exit aisle, which is like sitting in business class but paying for coach.

Other aisle seats are every inexperienced or non-sleeping traveller's favourite spot, but I can tell you from a sleeper's perspective that most aisle seats are sources of pain. There have been many occasions when I have started to fall asleep, and right when I begin to think that the flight could turn out to be perfect, a flight attendant comes speeding down the aisle with a giant drink cart that smashes directly into my knee-cap. I scream out in pain to let her know of the trauma I have just experienced, and I remove my knee from the now-dented drink cart. I give the flight attendant the bitterest look I can muster, but she continues down the row without apologizing.

Another disheartening thing about flying in and out of a university town like Halifax is the social interactions you encounter on board the plane. I almost always know someone on my flight, though I rarely know them as more than an acquaintance. But the most awkward of all interactions is when the one person you recognize is someone you used to go out with. A friend of mine had the ultimate pleasure of sitting next to a woman on one flight, during which the following words from her were the only ones they exchanged: "I know you, you know me, and that's all."

When it comes to actually getting home, everyone has a special taxi guy whom they consider to be "their guy." What makes the person special is his willingness to accept $10, or even $15, less than the average driver. But I've come to realize that choosing a taxi driver is like choosing a restaurant. If you're willing to spend some dough, you will likely enjoy a quality meal. In contrast, if you chose to go cheap on a cab in Halifax, you'll get what you pay for.

In other words, if you're taking the guy who charges $15 less, you're more likely to encounter a man who just left a bar, smokes a cigarette with the window open during the harshest of winter nights, and has a handful of stories that would scare the pants off any tough guy.

I recall driving home after one flight with "my taxi guy." We would pass nice landmarks that I once thought were beautiful, and the driver would say, "You see that bridge? That's where my best friend jumped off of. Yup, that was Charlie." On the the next corner was another nice spot. "You see that park over there? My buddy John got shot for the first time over by that tree."

While getting to and from Halifax is an inconvenience, I truly love the city, and I'd recommend Dalhousie to students across Canada, and beyond.

Taking time to save time

It was a moment in time, too swift to measure, when I knew something had gone wrong.

I was running for a bus, something I usually don't do, since I know it's both unnecessary and dangerous. On this particular day, the bus in question was an express and would have saved me 15 minutes on my way home.

Gershon Richter in Winnipeg

I was running on uneven ice, and as I neared the bus, my foot hit the ground at just the right angle to cause an injury. My foot twisted onto its side as I stepped down on it. I felt a strange sensation, not quite pain. I knew that I had hurt my foot, but I kept moving toward the bus, except now I was more stumbling than running. Long before I could come near it, the bus drove away, mocking me with its exhaust.

Although initially I couldn't feel how badly I was hurt, later I could not walk or move my ankle (which swelled to what seemed like the size of a small beluga whale) for the next two days.

Hopping around my messy room was like navigating a small obstacle course, and the hallway that leads to the rest of the house might as well have been the Swiss Alps. I couldn't go to school, I couldn't leave my room without great effort, and I couldn't move my ankle without pain. Even a week later, walking is still painful, and my ankle throbs after only 10 minutes of standing. In trying to save 15 minutes, I completely wasted two days of my time and put myself in pain for much longer.

Everywhere we go, we see people rushing. I can't understand the madness of those who speed and drive aggressively just to save a few minutes on a trip. A single accident would occupy them for at least as much time, and give them just as much stress, as they might save by speeding. I've also never understood people who feel the need to rush and keep looking at their watch, as if the 10 extra seconds gained from rushing will ever become useful to them.

> 'I can't understand the madness of those who speed and drive aggressively just to save a few minutes on a trip'

Then again, I never thought I was the kind of person to rush blindly for any reason, yet here I am with a sore ankle.

I ran for the bus because I never thought I might get hurt. It never occurred to me that I might be in pain for weeks afterward. The idea was so far-fetched that I never factored it into my split-second decision to run for the bus. On some level, I knew that what I was doing was dangerous, but I never connected that theoretical danger with real-life experience. I knew the fire was hot, but I'd never touched it myself.

Now, after being injured, I realize how it has changed my viewpoint. I needed to learn something, to make the danger real to me. To truly understand our actions, we must make a tangible connection between cause and effect – a connection that is most strongly made through experience. I will never again run on ice, just as most people who have been in car accidents later drive more carefully (and some become uncomfortable driving altogether).

These experiences may be traumatic, but they are in the end beneficial to us. They are the formative experiences of our personalities, the lessons we learn throughout our lives that let us adapt to changing circumstances. To use a cliché, they "build character."

My injury has taught me to approach every situation analytically, to think like a chess player – several moves ahead. Every little action has a reaction, and only careful planning and consideration can help us properly weigh the risks we face in everyday life.

We can't dodge all of life's dangers, but we can be confident in knowing that anything we experience helps us better deal with the future.

The Kirshner File

Sectarianism hobbles Iraq's rehabilitation

Three years ago this month, an allied force spearheaded by American troops invaded Iraq in a bold bid to reshape the Middle East. The aims of the ambitious operation were three-fold: to unseat Iraq's brutal dictator, Saddam Hussein; to convert that long-suffering country into a showcase of Arab democracy; and to bring Iraq into the Western sphere of influence.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The "shock and awe" invasion, a textbook example of military planning and efficiency, was completed in three weeks without major casualties.

At first blush, the invasion seemed like a resounding success. Saddam's Baathist regime, a bane to its neighbours and a curse to many Iraqis, fell without a whimper. The moment of collapse was captured in television footage of euphoric Iraqis pulling down a typically grandiose statue of Saddam in a Baghdad square.

But three years on, Iraq is far from "fixed."

Although Iraq is gradually moving toward a form of parliamentary democracy and slowly rebuilding its shattered infrastructure, it is beset by a crisis of profound proportions, and years may elapse before it is resolved.

Tribal sectarianism, pitting the majority Shiites against the Sunnis, threatens to tear Iraq asunder. Larry Diamond, a former high-ranking U.S. official in Iraq, has written that Iraq is heading toward a Lebanon-style civil war. The situation is so serious that the U.S. ambassador in Baghdad, Zalmay Khalizad, recently issued a dire warning. Declaring that sectarianism is "the fundamental problem" in Iraq, he said that an Iraqi government dominated by sectarian interests would lose U.S. support.

The minority Sunnis, having dominated Iraq since time immemorial, fear that the provisions in the new constitution will grant too many powers to autonomous regions and leave Iraq's oil wealth in the hands of the Shiites in the south and the Kurds in the north.

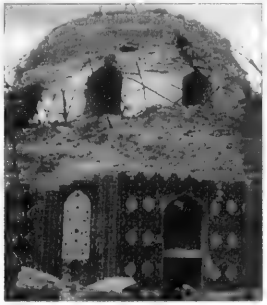
In light of last December's parliamentary election, during which a coalition of Shiite parties won 128 of 275 seats and thus became the largest single bloc in the legislature, the Sunnis also fear that their privileges will vanish and that they will be reduced to second-class citizenship.

Voicing misapprehensions about the constitution, a Sunni spokesman, Sheik Yahya Ibrahim al-Batawai, denounced it as a "Jewish constitution" and claimed that it would divide Iraq along sectarian and ethnic lines.

Though alert to Sunni alienation, the Shiite leadership is standing firm, having vowed not to give in to their insistent demands to revise the constitution. But otherwise, the Shiites have been flexible, having invited Sunnis to join a national unity government and asked junior officers from Saddam's old army to return to the ranks, a concession at odds with a U.S. directive that purged the military of Baathist members and sympathizers.

Despite these concessions, the Sunni-Shiite divide remains wide and deep. To the Sunnis, the Shiites are essentially agents of Iran and the Kurds are basically secessionists striving for statehood. To the Shiites and the Kurds, however, the Sunnis are diehard Baathists whose sole goal is to regain power and subjugate them once again.

These simmering mutual suspicions have exploded into an orgy of violence. Sunni and Shiite militias have targeted each other's communities and neighbourhoods, attacking mosques, schools, hospitals and markets, and thus exacerbated the tensions. The bombing of a venerable Shiite shrine in Samarra on Feb. 22, an incident that touched off a cycle of unprecedented sectarian violence, was symptomatic of the grave ethnic troubles that beset Iraq today.



The ruins of the Shiite shrine in Samarra

Yet Shiites and Sunnis are in agreement that the United States and its allies should pull out as soon as possible. Last November, in a rare show of unanimity, Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish leaders called for a timetable for the withdrawal of foreign forces.

For now, the United States has no intention of withdrawing. Its strategy is to placate the disaffected Sunnis so as to squelch the current insurgency and thereby stabilize Iraq. Two months ago, the United States' outgoing operational commander in Iraq, Gen. John Vines, said that the largely Sunni insurgency can be contained or crushed if Sunni politicians are politically empowered and included in the new cabinet. As he put it, "I think the nature of the government will determine the level of violence."

The insurgency – led by former Baathist officials and army officers and buttressed by Islamic foreign fighters from as close as Saudi Arabia and as far away as western Europe – has grown increasingly violent, sophisticated and resilient. Much like Afghanistan at the height of the Soviet era in the early 1980s, Iraq has become a magnet for Muslim fundamentalists challenging U.S. hegemony in the Mideast and working for the establishment of Islamic governments in the region. This development is probably the greatest unintended consequence of the war.

Insurgent attacks against U.S., British and Iraqi troops and convoys have dramatically multiplied since 2003 and now occur at a rate of 50 to 100 a day. The body count of U.S. soldiers killed in action reached the symbolic 2,000 mark last October and, as of last week, had climbed to almost 2,300. More than half of all U.S. military deaths in 2005 were caused by homemade bombs planted along roads and highways.

Compared to previous conflicts, from World War I to Vietnam, U.S. casualties in this war which is costing Washington a staggering $5 billion (US) per month – have been fairly minimal. But the mounting toll is definitely eroding American backing for the war. John Murtha, a hawkish congressman, has called for an immediate withdrawal of U.S. troops. President George W. Bush has brushed aside the notion of "artificial timetables."

Victory, if it is possible, may be far off. As Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, has pointed out, the average counterinsurgency in the 20th century lasted nine years. "There is no reason that we should believe that the insurgency in Iraq will take any less time to deal with," he observed.

In a concerted attempt to break the back of the insurgency, the U.S. has launched a series of offensives aimed at gaining control of cities like Falluja and Najaf – where Sunni and Shiite uprisings occurred two years ago – and cutting off the flow of foreign fighters streaming into Iraq through Syria and Iran.

A good many of the rebels have been killed, including Abu Azzam, a lieutenant of Abu Musab al Zarqawi, one of the leaders of the insurgency. But the insurgents keep popping up, attacking allied forces and supply lines, severing oil pipelines and blowing up themselves in suicide bombings that have wreaked a trail of destruction and havoc throughout Iraq.

As part of its counterinsurgency strategy, the U.S., aided by its European allies, is building an Iraqi security force capable of dealing effectively with the insurgents. Washington's assessment is that Iraq will need 325,000 soldiers and police officers to cope with the insurgency, but some analysts claim that the Iraqis remain years away from achieving that pivotal objective.

Even if the Iraqis themselves can take responsibility for protecting and stabilizing the country, American fighter and reconnaissance aircraft will be required to continue flying missions over Iraq for an indefinite period, according to Gen. John Jumper, the former commander of the U.S. Air Force.

Sunni support for the insurgency is not the United States' only problem. The pro-Iranian renegade Shiite cleric, Moktada al-Sadr, whose Mahdi Army has battled the Americans, is a destabilizing force, being hostile to the United States. Since he controls the largest bloc of seats in the Shiite alliance, he cannot be ignored. In a recent visit to Iran and Syria, Sadr expressed solidarity with these countries. The question is whether Sadr's influence can be kept at bay by moderate Shiites.

Reconstruction is another problem. Washington has allocated $25 billion (US) to improve vital services from sewage to electricity. But in some Iraqi provinces, projects have slowed or stopped because of insurgent attacks. In other cases, gross understaffing, a lack of technical expertise and bureaucratic infighting have hampered efforts.

In defending his Iraq policy, Bush has described it as a blend of idealism, pragmatism and flexibility, and promised to be steadfast: "We will stay in the fight until we have achieved total victory over the forces of tyranny and terrorism."

In promoting U.S. aims in Iraq, Bush has invoked Israel. As he said last December, "Israel's long-term survival depends upon the spread of democracy in the Middle East."

For a variety of strategic reasons, Israel has a definite interest in an American success in Iraq. But what counts now, at this crucial juncture, is whether sectarianism can be overcome so that the deadly insurgency can be defeated.

JF&CS Chaplaincy Services delivers taste of Pesach to institutions

Residents and inmates reconnect with Jewish identity

By ROCHELLE KAHN
Jewish Family & Child Service

Director of Chaplaincy Services for Jewish Family and Child Service, Rabbi Ronald Weiss is a very busy man. But each year at Passover, Rabbi Weiss bites off even more, delivering a taste of Pesach to long-term care residents and correctional facility inmates from Kingston to Kitchener, Penetanguishene to Hamilton. "For those living in an institutional setting, the sense of isolation from their heritage can be especially strong," Rabbi Weiss said, "and it's even more powerful during the holidays. JF&CS works hard to ease that familiar feeling of being a stranger in a strange land – and what could be more poignant than being away from one's family and loved ones at Pesach?"

As the Jewish population grows across the Greater Toronto Area, so does the number of those institutionalized and requiring Jewish outreach. JF&CS is committed to extending spiritual and religious care to all and meets the ever-growing demand with creative solutions to service delivery. Together with coordinator of chaplaincy Services Laila Clein Friedman, Rabbi Weiss has developed partnerships with caring individuals, synagogues and community organizations willing to lend a hand. For example, JF&CS coordinates training and supervision of volunteers who bring Pesach food to residents and organizes model seders for them. In places where communal seders are not often possible, like Ontario correctional facilities, Rabbi Weiss arranges kosher for Passover meals for all Jewish inmates and facilitates Pesach observance for those who wish to celebrate.

"What we do connects those required to live in non-Jewish institutions with a former time and place in their lives, a time and place they often feel was better," said Rabbi Weiss. "It goes beyond a matter of dignity; it restores their identity, their sense of who they are as Jews."

JF&CS Chaplaincy Services is committed to making this irreplaceable connection throughout the year as well. Rabbi Weiss remembers visiting a long-term care facility on a Friday afternoon a number of years ago for a Kabbalat Shabbat program. Early on, the residents were given a chance to light Shabbat candles. An elderly woman, confined to a wheelchair having had both legs amputated, quietly raised her hand and wheeled herself forward. "She covered her head with her shawl," Rabbi Weiss recalled, "recited the b'racha and started to cry. Embarrassed, she turned to me with a shy smile and said that this was the first time, since she had come to the nursing home, that she was able to light candles as she had done all her life before. Every one of us shared her tears."

With the help of funding support from UJA Federation, JF&CS is expanding its professional chaplaincy staff in those institutions that have a significant Jewish population.

Jewish Family and Child Service offers many rewarding volunteer opportunities that require a minimal time commitment. "You can play a significant part simply by donating one hour a week for a visit," Clein Friedman urged. As Rabbi Weiss continued, "Spending that small amount of time, providing weekly human contact and friendship to someone in a long-term care facility, has an immeasurably positive impact on everyone involved." If you have some time to donate or would like to know more about Chaplaincy Services volunteer opportunities at JF&CS, contact Laila Clein Friedman at 416. 638. 7800, ext 287.

UJA's One Cold Day warms up to Big Brothers

JF&CS Big Brothers shared their heartwarming experiences with more than 70 participants at the recent Hands on Toronto (HOT) One Cold Day program. Hands on Toronto is a UJA Federation of Greater Toronto Young Adult program that provides hands-on assistance to community members. HOT co-Chair Tracey Steyn wore two hats that day, speaking on behalf of HOT and also from her own personal experience as a Big Sister. Daniel Kozlov became a Big Brother last year but had one himself, growing up. "Fifteen years later," he said, "we are still very close and I speak with him twice a week."

Currently, there are 15 boys on the Jewish Family and Child Service waiting list for a Big Brother. If you would like to learn more about how you can join this meaningful program, contact JF&CS coordinator of volunteer services, Andrea Pines at 416.638.7800, ext 266.

(L to R) Robert Velensky, Tracey Steyn and Daniel Kozlov urge volunteers to join the JF&CS Big Brothers / Big Sisters program.

New JF&CS Speakers Circle has a lot to say

Trained speakers available for community programs

Domestic violence. Jewish poverty. Couples communication. Child abuse prevention. Bullying. The changing family in separation and divorce. Bereavement. The challenging teen. It reads like a menu of some of the hottest "hot button" issues we confront as a modern society. In fact, it's just a small sampling of the compelling topics that the new Jewish Family and Child Service Speakers Circle is ready to explore with community groups seeking dynamic and informative programming.

"Jewish Toronto looks to JF&CS for insight and information and we take our role in building awareness seriously," said Dr. Richard Cummings, JF&CS executive director. "That's why we've enhanced our existing speakers program and created the JF&CS Speakers Circle."

This vibrant extension of the agency's educational capacity will ensure that many kinds of programming options are available on a wide array of subjects, all delivered by expert JF&CS professionals and trained lay leadership representatives.

"Schools, synagogues, service organizations and other interested groups are invited to choose single-night programs or multi-session workshops, for large-scale community events or smaller audiences," said Dr. Barbara Bresver, chair of the JF&CS Speakers Circle. "Complementing a comprehensive and growing selection of suggested topics, Jewish Family and Child Service staff is happy to work with any group to customize a program to suit each user's particular needs."

Jewish Family and Child Service knows that it takes a well-informed community to successfully support its more vulnerable members. Eric Kirsh, supervisor of the JF&CS Financial Assistance and Rehabilitation Program and a veteran speaker for the agency, agrees. He underscored the great opportunity the JF&CS Speakers Circle has to sensitize people to the significant, and often uncomfortable, realities within the Jewish community.

"As Jews in the GTA, we shy away from accepting that contemporary social problems exist in the Jewish community," Kirsh said. "It's hard to admit that we have poverty and abuse in our own backyard, but we do."

Family Resource Centre helps York Region families

Mixing family fun with Jewish tradition

By ROCHELLE KAHN
Jewish Family & Child Service

There's nothing unusual about young children spending the morning in make-believe play. But what's happening at the York Region Family Resource Centre (FRC) is truly remarkable.

It's Friday morning at the FRC in the Promenade Mall and two toddlers are playing house, as children are known to do. But one child has been raised in an Orthodox home, steeped in ritual and tradition, and the other is from a secular family with limited connection to Jewish practice. Together, they are setting the table in their playhouse for Shabbat, as their mothers look on and chat about typical parenting concerns.

If not for the FRC, how would these families have ever come together to exchange ideas, stories and friendship?

"Not only is the Family Resource Centre a vital hub of Jewish and family life in York Region," explained supervisor Fran Chodak, "it's often an entry point for members of our community to connect with the broader Jewish world."

The Family Resource Centre is a partnership between the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) and Jewish Family and Child Service, supported by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. Since opening its doors in 2000, the need for the Family Resource Centre Services has exploded, reflecting York Region's booming stature as North America's fastest growing Jewish population.

"We have a huge Jewish community north of Steeles and there is nothing else that supports families of children aged newborn to five years in an inclusive, accessible and supportive environment," said Gail Gould, assistant executive director, Bathurst Jewish Community Centre. "Last month," Chodak reported, "we had 740 children enjoy our facilities during the 19 hours a week we're open. If we could finance it, we'd love to extend our hours further and welcome more than our typical 20 to 30 families a day."

Little friends at York Region's Family Resource Centre prepare for Shabbat together.

The Family Resource Centre offers quite an enticing family participation package. At no cost, members can access the toy library and parenting resources, in addition to receiving discounted rates for all JF&CS Jewish Family Life Education and Group Counselling programs. More than half of JF&CS Family Life Education groups explore key parenting issues.

Professional counselling at JF&CS offers added benefits

Attitudes toward seeking professional counselling have come a long way. Today, counselling is highly regarded as a positive and empowering choice in learning how best to effectively manage the challenges and complexities of modern life. "We've accepted its value," observed Ron Cohen, counselling coordinator for Jewish Family and Child Service. "We understand counselling as a way of taking charge of our own circumstances, by actively exploring better ways to cope. The results can be very strengthening for a family, couple or individual, enabling effective problem-solving and improved communication. The skills learned through counselling," he continued, "help people better understand and handle everyday situations as they arise."

Jewish Family and Child Service has been a trusted counselling resource throughout its 135 years of service to the GTA Jewish community. As a dynamic, multidisciplinary agency, JF&CS is in a unique position to offer added benefits to counselling clients. While counsellors work privately with families, couples and individuals in confidentiality, they are backed up by the collective experience and insight of the entire range of Jewish Family and Child Service professional staff.

"Beyond that support, our counselling staff is tuned into all the specialized JF&CS Family Life Education and Counselling Groups programming," explained Debra Feldman who supervises the counselling services. "They are well positioned to identify clients who could benefit from assistance in other areas, or in need of specialized follow-up in a group setting, and act as a conduit to everything else JF&CS provides."

Cohen suggested that, while people come to counselling for many different and compelling reasons, they share a common desire to feel heard, understood and safe. "To consistently provide that is not only my job; it's my work ethic and the professional culture of JF&CS."

Families, couples and individuals turn to JF&CS for counselling to learn how to manage everyday life concerns such as sadness, communication difficulties, family tensions, job stress and anxiety. JF&CS sponsors high conflict symposium for mental health professionals

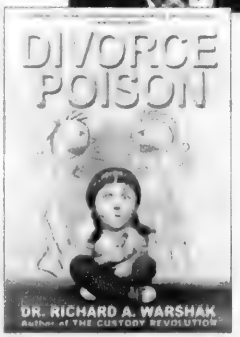
Children caught in the crossfire of divorce and separation. It's a regrettable reality in the changing dynamic of many modern families, but what's most unfortunate is that it doesn't have to be part of the picture at all. Effectively protecting our kids from their parents' conflict is the theme of the second annual professional symposium on high conflict divorce, led by Jewish Family and Child Service in conjunction with the High Conflict Forum.

Divorce Poison: Clinical and Legal Considerations in working with Families of Alienated Children will pick up where last year's celebrated, first-ever symposium for high conflict families of divorce and separation left off. The forum brings together the entire spectrum of involved professionals, from lawyers and judges to mental health workers, child welfare agencies to psychiatrists, mediators to police.

The April 26 event, which will offer advanced training to professionals in supporting kids in difficult divorce situations, features renowned clinician, research psychologist and author Dr. Richard Warshak.



JF&CS presents renowned author and research psychologist Dr. David Warshak at Divorce Poison symposium.

"Truly hearing a child's voice in custody decisions is a complex matter. I think we've understood the benefits of listening to them, more clearly than we've understood the hazards," noted Warshak. "As professionals, we don't necessarily recognize when a child has been set up to act as an advocate or an adversary in a high-conflict divorce."

Warshak is encouraged by opportunities, like the JF&CS-led symposium, to build heightened professional awareness. "There's a problem when kids take sides on behalf of one parent against another," said Warshak. "For their own long-term best interest, they need to know it's unacceptable. Parents must understand that fostering this kind of discord not only hurts the child, but everyone connected to him or her."

Howard Hurwitz, chair of Divorce Poison and director of Children's Services at JF&CS, commends the more than 30 agencies and over 400 individuals who have already committed to take part in Divorce Poison. "Last year's high conflict symposium was a resounding success and delivered a clear message. We need to better train members of our profession to respond to the growing needs of children in high conflict situations," Hurwitz said.

The closing portion of the program will present a panel of professionals who will address issues raised by Dr. Warshak's material and focus on key points relating to Ontario children and families.

Following the one-day forum, findings will be compiled and a report will be available to the community on the JF&CS website, www.jfandcs.com

Conservative scholar: halachah inherently flexible

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

What sets the Conservative movement apart from Reform Judaism is the former's commitment to the halachic system, says Rabbi David Golinkin. "What sets us apart from Orthodoxy is that we believe Halachah is inherently flexible."

Rabbi Golinkin, the American-born president of the Schechter Institute in Jerusalem, disagrees strongly with his New York-based colleague Rabbi Neil Gillman, a philosophy professor at the Jewish Theological Seminary, who said at the Conservative movement's biennial convention in December that Conservative Judaism should "abandon its claim that we are a halachic movement."

Rabbi Golinkin, the law committee chair of the Rabbinical Assembly in Israel, teaches Talmud and Jewish law (Halachah) to rabbinical students at Schechter's seminary, which trains Masorti rabbis, and has lectured widely in North America on Halachah.

His most recent project was the editing of Responsa and Halakhic Studies, a 30-year-old book by the late Rabbi Isaac Klein, which was recently rereleased.

"If the Conservative movement abandons its claim to be a halachic movement, it really has no reason to exist," said Rabbi Golinkin in a phone interview prior to his recent visit to Toronto, where he was scholar-in-residence at Beth Tzedec Congregation and keynote speaker at the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism's Torah in Toronto program.

The responsa in Rabbi Klein's book "remind us that it's possible to be flexible and lenient within the halachic tradition," said Rabbi Golinkin. "Many of Rabbi Klein's responsa are lenient, but they're based on sources, not on his personal opinion or public pressure."

Through his experience both at Schechter and on the lecture circuit, Rabbi Golinkin – who has been teaching for about 25 years – said he has found the younger generation of rabbinical students to be somewhat more interested in Halachah than some of the previous generations.

Also, whenever he speaks to lay audiences in North America about Halachah, he finds "a great interest both in approach and in the specific topics."

He believes that if Halachah were truly irrelevant to Conservative synagogue members – of whom only a small percentage keep kosher and are Shabbat observant – they would have joined Reform congregations instead.

"But there are some 750 Conservative synagogues in North America, some 50 in Israel, about 50 in South America and Europe, and now there is [a presence] in Australia, so there are people who are choosing Conservative Judaism because we're different from Reform.

"Does that mean all Conservative Jews live a halachic lifestyle? No, unfortunately, not yet." However, he noted, he doesn't believe the situation implies a lack of understanding of the importance of Halachah.

The level of observance among Masorti Jews in Israel, particularly in Jerusalem, is much higher than that of their counterparts in North America and elsewhere, he noted. At one Jerusalem congregation he cited, almost all the congregants walk to shul on Shabbat and almost all of them keep kosher.

More tales of old Toronto

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Roots & Remembrance

It's been about a decade since zealous language inspectors in Quebec forbade the importation of some kosher-for-Passover foods because of improper French labelling, thus launching Montreal's infamous "Matzah-gate" controversy.

While perusing the Toronto Star's "Pages of the Past" searchable database, I noticed that Toronto also had a "Matzah-gate" controversy. Nearly a century ago, in 1909, zealous police officers climbed a ladder to a second-floor rear window and raided the National Matzo and Biscuit Company. Several employees preparing dough for baking were busted for violating the province's "blue" Sunday laws.

"Mayor thinks the Police are Too Severe," the Star reported, indicating mayor Joseph Oliver's disapproval of the police action. "My own opinion is that the police department should be more tolerant in cases of this kind, and I think some arrangement should be made whereby the police should not interfere in the case of Jewish bakeries," Oliver said.

In 1908, a "small-sized riot" occurred in the city's labour bureau, where workers lined up daily for jobs. Aggravated at being repeatedly passed over, some Jews created a "little rumpus" and one was arrested. In court, bureau officials admitted they routinely excluded Jews, under orders from above.

"Park Commissioner Harris told me that he would rather do without Jews on the Riverdale work than to use them," a city bureaucrat admitted. "He says they are not fit for the work, so lately we have been trying to sandwich in a dozen English, Irish or Scotch between the gangs of Jews and Macedonians."

The charges were dropped and the judge ordered that workers be hired on a more equitable basis in future.

A century ago, Rabbi Solomon Jacobs provided a strong defence against a reckless assertion that wife-desertion was rife among the Jews in the downtown Ward neighbourhood.

"In the Ward, there are Catholics, Presbyterians, and members of all other denominations," Rabbi Jacobs noted. "But why should the poor Jew always be dragged into discussions of this kind? As soon as I read Miss Cook's statement, I at once communicated with the heads of the different charitable institutions of the city. They told me they were not cognizant of one case of wife-desertion among Jews."

Sometimes referred to as the city's "foreign quarter," the Ward (bounded by Yonge, Queen, University and College streets) presented special challenges to census takers in 1911. Many residents were reluctant to answer questions, and those who did often had a poor grasp of English and were anything but precise. The enumerators were exasperated.

"He knows that he was born 'in the Old Country,' but just when or where it is difficult to say. He knows that he came to Canada 'in a big ship,' but that was years ago, too. Of English months he has but little idea: something happened 'in the summer' or 'in the winter'… His youngest child was born in Toronto. Good, here is something tangible at last, but when? In Purim. What is Purim?"

The Star offers many such tableaux, but space allows for just one more, "Death-Bed Divorce," which consists of a single sentence:

"That the Jewish race still adheres to the letter of the old Mosaic law was made evident in a recent religious divorce granted by Rabbi [Jacob] Gordon at a death-bed in the Western hospital, where, at mutual request, Mrs. M. Cohen was divorced from her dying husband in order that she might escape the tenets of a creed which provides that when a husband of the race dies childless the widow must marry the deceased's brother, that the family might be continued."

This 1912 report adheres to the paper's frequent characterization of the Jews as a colourful foreign element of ancient and exotic provenance.

Moroccan independence

This year marks the 50th anniversary of the arrival of the first Moroccan immigrants in Canada. The following column is part of a series

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Through A Sephardi Window

Arguably, Christopher Columbus' planting of the Spanish flag on the shores of the Americas was the moment that ushered in the era of European colonization of the New World. From this point onward, Europeans would view the entire world as their very own – as both their privilege and their opportunity. From India to Indo-China, from the Americas to Africa, the various governments of Europe came calling.

Whether their intentions were benevolent or imperial is an endless debate. For better or for worse – and indeed, most probably for a good measure of both – the white men of Europe came to rule the dark-skinned men of far-off lands. Whether by invitation or by imposition, for export or for exploit, the Europeans had arrived.

North Africa, and Morocco in particular, became the stomping ground of not one, but two foreign powers: France and Spain. The northern coastal region came under Spanish jurisdiction, while the bulk of the area to the south came under French administration.

The process was gradual, and started with concern and interest, followed by varied forms of assistance, then the advancement of money in the form of loans that Morocco had no hope of ever repaying. The country, in essence, became collateral for this money.

Two key things contributed to the Moroccans' rejection of France's occupation. One was World War II. While in Morocco, the French conscripted entire legions of Moroccans to help in their war effort. Arabs who helped liberate Europe while fighting side by side with the Allies subsequently returned home and brought with them the realization that it was they and their country that were in real need of liberation – from the French!

Secondly, the French, emboldened by the Allied victory against the Germans, exiled the nationalist king of Morocco, Sidi Mohamed the Fifth, along with his entire family, to the island of Madagascar. In his place, they appointed a puppet king.

Sidi Mohamed, of blessed memory, was a most beloved and benevolent king. For the population, this situation was intolerable. There was an uproar, and chaos reigned in the streets. The French soon recognized their misstep and retreated.

The king was allowed to return. France would facilitate Moroccan independence and the two countries, Morocco and France pledged to remain on amicable terms.

In the end, it was not anti-Semitism, pogroms or any such oppression, nor was it the search for adventure or fortune, that brought Jewish immigrants to Canada. Instead, it was Moroccan independence.

After years of European colonization of Africa and years of social upheaval and political instability, Morocco was independent. But the Jews had always favoured the European presence and viewed it as progressive, enlightened and full of opportunity. Now, as they saw their country reverting back to a Muslim state, foreboding and uncertainty were the order of the day. Rumours were rampant, among them that all young men would be forcibly conscripted into the king's newly formed army.

Fortunately, these fears never materialized. Morocco remained, as it does to this day, a tranquil island in a turbulent pan-Arab sea. It is tolerant of, and welcoming to, Jews. Nevertheless, the tide of emigration had begun, a tide that would not stop. Hundreds of thousands of Jews would leave.

Today, only a few thousand remain, and they live in relative safety and prosperity.

Kabbalah: A Very Short Introduction by Joseph Dan, Oxford University Press.

Connecting to God: Ancient Kabbalah and Modern Psychology by Rabbi Abner Weiss.

Kabbalah is now a major industry. Who would have believed it? In recent year celebrities such as Madonna, Britney Spears and Paris Hilton have made news for studying Kabbalah's teachings, learning Hebrew and donning red string bracelets to protect against the evil eye. Even Target stores, riding the red-string fashion trend, briefly carried the bracelets last year but pulled them after Jewish groups complained.

In many cities across North America, ordinary people, their curiosity piqued, have started Kabbalah study groups, taking Kabbalah lessons online and celebrating Jewish culture.

Kabbalah is thought to offer the secret to achieving joy and fulfilment, offering a definitive answer to that universal question: What is my purpose in life?

Books about Kabbalah abound. Some are scholarly and erudite, others lack authenticity and read like candy for the eye.

Joseph Dan is a professor of Kabbalah in the department of Jewish thought at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and the author of numerous books on Jewish mysticism.

In this short introduction to a complex and many-sided subject, he points out that hundreds of Internet sites are dedicated to New Age-type presentations of various world-views that claim to be kabbalistic. Most of them are Christian, but many of them are propagated by Jewish writers.

They serve groups and circles of adherents, spread all over the globe. Most of the material is a combination of apocalyptic speculations, astrology, and alchemy; one of the central concepts attributed to the Kabbalah is that of reincarnation of souls, and another is the cosmic harmony among the various aspects of the universe and the divine realm.

The author provides a succinct overview of Kabbalah's historical background, including groups in ancient and medieval Judaism, the expansion of Kabbalah studies under Isaac Luria in the 16th century and its place in Chassidism, Christianity and "new thought." The book covers the ancient and main works: Sefer Yezira (The Book of Creation), The Book of Bahir and The Zohar.

In Connecting to God, Weiss, a distinguished rabbi, marriage and family therapist and popular lecturer, explains the major teachings of Kabbalah, showing how the 10 Sefirot, or divine emanations, including love, wisdom, understanding and empathy are building blocks of divine energy. He writes that the ancient truths of the Kabbalah are the bridge between psychology and the quest for spiritual meaning.

Rabbi Weiss shares 28 stories of individuals, couples and families who, under his guidance, used kabbalistic exercises along with contemporary psychological strategies to "liberate themselves from their self-defeating ways of being." Many readers may see aspects of their own life stories in these retellings.

This is a serious study with much helpful information about Kabbalah. But the elaborate structure the author has erected about the Sefirot and their intimate relation to various parts to the human body appears contrived. Moreover, some of the accounts of psychological healing seem to have only limited relationship to the power and teaching of Kabbalah.

Hamantaschen on the web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Purim is almost on our doorstep and, if we are lucky, so too will be baskets of mishloach manot, the ready-to-eat treats that are exchanged on the holiday. Occupying the premier place in those baskets are hamantaschen, the triangular cookies said to be reminiscent of the evil Haman's pockets or perhaps his odd-looking ears.

Sure, you can prepare the old standbys filled with prunes or poppy seeds. But why not be daring and go for cream cheese or chocolate peanut butter or some of the more than 60 other recipes at the Jewish-food HAMANTASCHEN archives? [http://tinyurl.com/hedos] (By the way, if you're planning on leaving some hamantaschen on MY doorstep, I think I'll pass on the beef-and-onion-filled variety. [http://tinyurl.com/k4ahd])

Just because you are watching the calories or have a food sensitivity doesn't mean you can't indulge in a hamantasch or two. This low-fat recipe only uses only two tablespoons of oil. [http://tinyurl.com/mwvpz] If you cannot tolerate wheat gluten, here are a couple of recipes you can try out. [http://tinyurl.com/hcrsc] Jewish Friends with Diabetes have directions for low-carb hamantaschen. [http://tinyurl.com/g7bm8] JewishVeg.com has a vegan recipe that calls for lecithin flakes, almond milk and flax seeds. [http://tinyurl.com/gb69m]

The popular children's song Ani Purim expresses the wish that the holiday could be celebrated monthly. [http://tinyurl.com/z6ajb] Amy Sara Clark has put her finger on an interesting – and troubling – phenomenon: the availability of hamantaschen year-round, even in non-Jewish bakeries. Cookbook author Joan Nathan says the growing popularity of hamantaschen is "like getting challah all days of the week," she says. "I don't want to get challah all days of the week. I want it on [Shabbat]." [http://tinyurl.com/p6e4f]

There is a well-known tradition on Purim to become so intoxicated that you no longer know the difference between the righteous Mordechai and the evil Haman. But could you unknowingly get a different kind of high by indulging in too many poppy seed hamantaschen? After all, poppy seeds are used in the creation of opium. That's what investigators in Oregon wanted to find out (although they used bundt cakes rather than hamantaschen in their 1992 study.) According to the abstract at the Journal of Forensic Sciences, you can munch away with a clear conscience. "All of the urine specimens were found to be opiate positive shortly after consuming the cake; however… no subjects were found to exhibit symptoms of opiate impairment." [http://tinyurl.com/g9t64]

When it comes to Jewish cooking, quality is important but let's not forget about quantity. Cake specialist Ron Ben-Israel thought he had baked the biggest hamantasch. Measuring more than 2½ feet along the length of the triangle's walls and almost two feet tall, the pastry fed 400 hungry guests at the party thrown by Chabad on Washington Square. [http://tinyurl.com/zepsb] Little did Ben-Israel know that his creation was dwarfed by the work of the students at Shaare Shamayim-Beth Judah synagogue in northeast Philadelphia. Their treat weighed in at 738.5 pounds, measuring 20 by 20 by 20 feet. [http://tinyurl.com/fxu9a] In the case of that huge hamantash, the students chose to fill theirs with pie filling.

Deborah Biskin has written a charming memoir about the day she and her daughters stumbled upon the best ingredient of all for their hamantaschen. [www.jewish-holiday.com/hamantaschen.html]

"I suggested we use the traditional prune and poppy fillings, but Rachel and Jessica crinkled up their noses. I then hit on it: 'How about chocolate?' Hours later, piles of hamantaschen were strewn around the kitchen, some sticky with filling that leaked out the sides, funny looking. I felt a sense of pride. My girls and I were actually doing a mitzvah together. Our results certainly were not esthetically or gastronomically perfect, but it came from the heart. I now realize that the flavour of the fruit or type of jam filling is irrelevant. The best hamantaschen in the world are those filled with love."

לקראת פורים-תמן תחדש

פתח באשוויץ-דברים בשם אומרם

"הלכתי ברחוב בברצלונה וגיליתי אמת מחרידה: אירופה פתחה באשוויץ. הרגנו שישה מיליון יהודים והחלפנו אותם בעשרים מיליון מוסלמים. באושוויץ שרפנו תרבות, מחשבה, יצירתיות, הרסנו את העם הנבחר, באמת נבחר, כי הם הולידו אנשים גדולים ונפלאים אשר שינו את העולם. תרומתם של האנשים האלה מדגישת בכל תחומי החיים: מדע, אמנות, מסחר בינלאומי ומעל לכל-מצפון של העולם. אלה האנשים ששרפנו, תחת העמדות פנים של סובלנות, ומכיוון שרצינו להוכיח לעצמנו שרצאנו מגחלת הנאציזם, פתחנו שעריהם לעשרים מיליון מוסלמים אשר הביאו עליהם טפשות ובורות, קיצוניות דתית ואי סובלנות, פשע ועוני הנובעים מאי רצון לעבוד ולקיים את משפחותיהם בכבוד. הם הפכו את הערים היפהפיות שלנו לעולם שלישי, טובעות בזוהמה ופשע. הם מסתגרים בדירות שקיבלו בחינם מהממשלה ובוזזו הם מתכננים את הרצח ההמוני של מאזרחיהם התמימים.

Gesher on Ice creates winter camp experience for youth

By BARBARA SILVERTSTEIN
Special to The CJN

There was a party mood when Camp Gesher youth convened at the Borochov Centre in Tornto for an out-of-town retreat last month.

Piles of backpacks and sleeping bags sat in the parking lot as the campers hugged and kibbitzed, oblivious to the cold. The group was bound for Gesher on Ice, a fun-filled weekend at the camp run by the labour Zionist youth movement Habonim Dror.

This annual Shabbaton-like retreat at the camp, about an hour's drive north of Belleville, is usually geared to Gesher Campers or local Habonim Dror youth group participants. However, this year, Gesher on Ice was also part of a joint outreach program for Jewish youth in small communities sponsored by Gesher and Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario (RJCO).

This was the first time Gesher campers and staff hosted an RJCO youth group, said Daryn Epstein, co-ordinator of community services and youth outreach for RJCO, noting that a total of 35 young people participated, nine of whom were part of the RJCO group.

He explained that RJCO, a department of United Israel Appeal Federations Canada, runs outreach programs for youth and adults in small towns "to bring Jewish life to these communities."

An RJCO group of about 30 youths from Guelph, Kitchener Waterloo, Barrie and St. Catherines have been together for some three years and Gesher on Ice was "a great opportunity for them to make new Jewish friends," said Epstein. "For some of the children in this group, the weekend was the first time they were in a totally Jewish environment.

"It was a very positive experience. The RJCO kids integrated well with the Camp Gesher kids. Everyone felt comfortable. The RJCO kids led the Havdallah service. It was really beautiful – outdoors under the stars."

The weekend introduced the RJCO group to Jewish camping and Zionism, he continued. "The Jewish camp environment is one the most positive ways of developing Jewish identity among youth."

Getting his youth group better acquainted with the Gesher campers was very important because the RJCO kids will join some of the Gesher group for the annual summer trip to Israel organized by Habonim Dror North America, Epstein said. "Gesher on Ice was an opportunity for RJCO kids to meet and network with other Jewish kids travelling to Israel to help ensure the success of the Israel trip."

Habonim Dror was the "logical partner" for the Israel trip because Gesher does a lot of outreach to small communities in Ontario," he said. "Gesher has a strong base of campers from small communities. Some kids from the RJCO group are already attending the camp."

He said there is also a "natural fit" between RJCO and Camp Gesher because Omer Eshel, the shaliach for Camp Gesher Habonim Dror also works for RJCO, and the two groups have partnered in several outreach initiatives to small communities.

Joint fall weekend seminars where Gesher brings a large contingent of campers from the big centres to interact with their counterparts in smaller towns have been very successful, Eshel said.

"At the fall seminar in Barrie, we hosted a Shabbat dinner for the Barrie community to introduce Gesher to the community."

Eshel, who has been the shaliach for almost three years, helps manage the camp in the summer and oversees the Habonim Dror youth group during the school year.

He pointed out that Gesher also runs programs independently of RJCO, and that this outreach activity preceded his terms as shaliach. "Camp Gesher started 4½ years ago to bring Zionism to the small communities. We're the only Zionist organization that does outreach to the small communities."

He stressed that the Camp Gesher brand of outreach makes a big impact. "When we do the seminars, we take the large groups of kids from Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal and they bring the camp experience to small communities.

"It's very rare for these small towns to see a group of 80 Jewish kids in their community."

It's a win-win situation, he added, because Gesher's partnership with RJCO also boosts enrolment at the camp. "Today, the second-largest group of kids coming to Gesher are coming through RJCO as a result of the fall seminars. They quickly feel a part of the camp community.

"Gesher is a big mishpachah so the kids feel very welcome. When we bring the kids together, there is openness and acceptance. That is what has attracted the RJCO kids to enrol in the camp."

Dialogue group handles fallout from cartoons

By ABIGAIL CUKIER
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Members of the Committee for Hamilton Arab, Muslim and Jewish Dialogue believe they have prevented angry protests in Hamilton over the reprinting of Danish cartoons of the Muslim prophet Muhammad.

Committee member Lorne Finkelstein said last month's decision by the Calgary-based Western Standard magazine to reprint some of the cartoons was the committee's first "real crisis," and proved the group is having a positive effect.

The committee, which started up last September and grew out of the controversy surrounding Hamilton Police Chief Brian Mullan's trip to Israel last year with other Ontario law enforcement officials, aims to promote understanding and respect between Hamilton's Arab, Muslim and Jewish residents.

After news broke of the reprinted cartoons, Ali Cheaib, president of the Hamilton Council of Canadian Arabs and a member of the dialogue committee, asked Finkelstein to call an urgent meeting of the group. Hussein Hamdani, a committee member and chair of the Ihya Foundation, asked him to make a public statement condemning the cartoons' publication. (The Jewish Free Press in Calgary also reprinted some of the Danish cartoons.)

Javid Mirza, another committee member and president of the Muslim Association of Hamilton, said members of Hamilton's Muslim community reacted negatively to the fact the Western Standard's publisher, Ezra Levant, is Jewish.

"Some said, 'See, look what he did, see,'" Mirza said. "I had to point out to them that most of the mainstream media did not [reprint the cartoons].

"Because of the group, we were able to speak with each other and defuse tensions in the community. It had a profound effect within the community having someone from the Jewish community standing right beside them."

Mirza said Gerry Fisher, executive director of the UJA Federation of Hamilton and also a member of the dialogue committee, sent him statements from Jewish organizations opposing the decision to reprint the cartoons, which Mirza sent as a mass e-mail to hundreds of people in the local Muslim and Arab communities.

Popular CHML radio talk show host Roy Green had Finkelstein, Cheaib and Mirza on his show to discuss the issue.

Finkelstein noted that when they met in the station's lobby, there was no tension or anger among the three men, despite the controversial issue.

"I said I certainly support a free press, but a free press with caution when it comes to insulting other people," Finkelstein said. "But I also said that throughout the Middle East, there are horrific anti-Semitic cartoons and rhetoric, and I have yet to hear Muslim or Arab leaders come out and say this is not acceptable.

"I would condemn any purposeful incitement, but would expect reciprocity."

Although the committee had agreed the three would not discuss events in the Middle East, Finkelstein said he noted that such items are easily accessed in Canada via the Internet.

"On air, Ali agreed there was no room for purposeful insulting of any religious group," Finkelstein said. "Javid agreed and condemned the protests in other countries over the cartoons."

The men told Green they were sure the group had helped to defuse tensions over the cartoons.

"If we hadn't had this relationship, hadn't built up this dialogue, I don't know what would have happened, but I think it's possible there would have been protests at [the offices of] Jewish organizations," Finkelstein said.

He acknowledged that members of Hamilton's Jewish, Muslim and Arab communities have expressed skepticism about the group, but he is proud of it, especially after it handled its first major issue.

"This is an example of how it's working," Mirza said.

Israeli truckers recruited to drive in Manitoba

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — David Shapiro is one of more than three dozen mainly Russian-born Israeli truck drivers who have recently been recruited to fill the large demand for drivers in Manitoba.

Shapiro is originally from Azerbaijan. He immigrated to Israel 15 years ago with his family when he was still in his teens. He and his wife, Ilana, had been living near Netanya and have been in Winnipeg for the past six months.

Shapiro said he was a truck driver in the army and later drove for Taavura Ltd., Israel's largest trucking company. Most recently, he was a driver for Tnuva, the Israeli dairy co-op. A friend told him about the job opportunities in Winnipeg, which is home to several sizeable trucking companies.

Israeli truck driver David Shapiro and his wife Ilana.

The man behind the drive to bring Israeli truck drivers to Canada is Bulgarian-born Lubo Todorov, the founder of two-year-old Ideal Driver Training.

"It is becoming increasingly difficult finding younger Canadians who want careers in the trucking industry as drivers," said Todorov, who isn't Jewish. "I researched the best countries for sourcing new drivers according to certain criteria."

They include familiarity with winter driving conditions – most of the Israelis he's recruited once drove in Russia – as well as experience in different geographical areas. Other criteria include being eligible to drive in the United States (the destination for 90 per cent of Manitoba loads), reasonable English skills and knowledge of North American trucking equipment.

"The best sources for drivers according to our criteria were Israel and Germany," Todorov said.

Todorov does his best to prepare his foreign-born prospective new drivers before they arrive in Canada. He provides the recruits with driver handbooks with Russian translations so that they can study for the tests they have to pass here before they can go to work in the industry. He also encourages them to learn English, and he takes care of the immigration paperwork beforehand.

In the case of Shapiro and some of the first group of drivers, Todorov did interviews over the phone and assessed their driving by watching a video that Shapiro's wife, Ilana, took of the group.

But not all the Russian-born Israeli drivers that have contacted Todorov have come to Winnipeg through his efforts.

Levin is originally from Belarus and went to Israel 14 years ago at age 29. He started driving trucks in Belarus, and in Israel he worked for a couple of different trucking companies. His wife and three sons are still in Israel. He is scheduled to take his road test this month, after which Todorov will put him in touch with prospective employers.

Todorov also noted that he is working closely with Winnipeg's Jewish community to help the newcomers adjust to life in Manitoba's capital.

"We have a very good relationship with the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg," he said. "We had a table at the community's job fair in the fall and the community sends us clients, too."

"The Jewish community has been very helpful," Shapiro agreed.

"They helped us find an apartment and I am a member of the Rady Jewish Community Centre."

For Winnipeg's Jewish community, which is trying to grow its population, Russian-born Israelis have become the largest source of new immigrants in the last year, as immigration from Argentina has largely dried up since the economy in that country stabilized.

'Everyone has a story,' broadcast veteran says

By REBECA KUROPATWA
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Sylvia Kuzyk, a news anchor and weather reporter for CKY, Winnipeg's CTV station, was one of the first women broadcasters in Manitoba and Western Canada.

Today, she is the host of CKY's News at Noon, and also reports on local entertainment and the weather on the station's News at 6. She got her start working for Winnipeg's CKY-TV in 1974 as a weather newscaster.

Kuzyk spoke last month about "Living in the Public Eye," as part of the "Conversations" lecture series hosted by the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba's Women's Endowment Fund.

From left, CKY news anchor Sylvia Kuzyk is seen with Marilyn Prober and Susan Kay, co-chairs of the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba's "Conversations" speaker series.

"Although youth has always been highly regarded, I am lucky to work with people who also see the value in experience, commitment and involvement," Kuzyk said. "Instead of aging, I would describe the theme of tonight's lecture as growth and development. It more clearly demarks the requirements of time, effort and involvement.

"I've been part of the CTV, formerly CKY, news team, for the duration of my television career," she added. "This is something I take great pride in."

Kuzyk told the audience that despite being in the public eye, she is innately private and shy, and has been from a very early age. "When I immigrated to Canada with my family [from Germany] at about the age of six, I didn't know the English language yet. I felt intensely shy and just wanted to disappear from my teachers. I couldn't stand in front of the class to speak."

She said she became a nurse, got married and had her daughter, Vanessa. "I stayed at home with her for the first three years of her life."

Then, she said, "I decided to take a theatre course. My shyness began to transform into something else. I began to discover how to be myself."

Kuzyk noted that her "first couple of years as a weather broadcaster were very difficult. I remember just shaking when that camera turned on. It was horrible. Not only was I balancing a career and family, but also that old spectre of my reservedness, shyness and lack of confidence made it so hard.

"Particularly when you are faced with a challenging situation, all of your old insecurities come flooding back. It wouldn't get any better until I realized that it is futile to try to make everyone happy. The key, I discovered, is to like and accept who you are, yourself. It was only then that I could relax a bit and go forward."

Something else Kuzyk said she learned "is that everybody has a story to tell.

"I met a woman whom I had at first only spoken to over the phone. During one phone conversation, she told me that she is a quadriplegic and had been living at the Misericordia Hospital [in Winnipeg] for the last 25 years. She had two daughters, and one day, she had a car accident that landed her in the hospital. She and I became friends, and I would go and visit her at the hospital. She has since passed away."

Asked for her thoughts on the controversial Danish newspaper cartoons of the Muslim Prophet Muhammad, Kuzyk said, "It is sad, seeing all of the pain, suffering and killing that happens because of religious extremism. Some subjects, although I might risk sounding anti-freedom of expression, should be kept out of the news."

But, she added, "it's important to have honest, objective news."

Kuzyk said she "greatly values family, friends and community... I wouldn't be who I am today without that support."

She calls Winnipeg her hometown and feels that "knowing your roots, who you are, where you came from, and maintaining interconnectedness are so important. A couple of years ago, my mother passed away. This has taught me, even more, how important it is to treasure each moment."

Kuzyk has been active in several charitable causes, including the Central Speech and Hearing Clinic, the United Way and Easter Seals. Among other honours, she was the recipient of the public service award from the Kidney Foundation of Canada, the John Alexander Media Award from the Multiple Sclerosis Society of Canada in 1994, the Manitoba Volunteerism Award in 1996, the YM/YWCA Women of Distinction in Media and Communications Award in 2004 and the Broadcasters Association of Manitoba's Excellence Award in 2005.

Hamas may not be Israel's biggest problem

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Hamas' victory in the recent Palestinian parliamentary elections has opened the door to increased Iranian intervention on Israel's doorstep, according to Winnipeg Free Press columnist Sam Segev ("Rice finds defiance in the Mideast," March 1).

Given Iran's determination to pursue a nuclear weapons program in defiance of the international community, and given repeated declarations of its feverishly anti-Semitic president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to "wipe Israel off the map," such increased Iranian involvement is seen by many analysts as dangerously destabilizing.

"According to Israeli intelligence sources," Segev writes, Hamas' "political" leader Khaled Meshal "has formed a 'strategic alliance' with Iran. In return for non-recognition of Israel and continued terrorism against the Jewish state, Iran will provide Hamas 'unlimited' financial and military assistance via Syria and Lebanon's Hezbollah." Segev also notes that Iran continues with Syria's help to supply arms to Hezbollah and to "pro-Syrian Palestinian terrorist groups in South Lebanon's refugee camps."

Hamas' election victory has emboldened Syria's President Bashar Assad. In January, Ahmadinejad met in Damascus with Hamas leaders, including Meshal, pledging his support for Palestinian "resistance" (i.e. terrorist) groups.

Late last month, Meshal met again with Ahmadinejad in Tehran. Ahmadinejad, along with Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, promised to fund a Hamas-led Palestinian government in the event that the United States and the European Union cut off funds.

Citing an interview with Meshal published in the Feb. 28 issue of the London-based Arabic daily Al-Hayat, Segev noted Meshal's continual refusal to recognize Israel's legitimacy and to disarm. The most Meshal is prepared to offer is a "long-term" ceasefire with Israel in return for Israel's total withdrawal from the West Bank, along with Israel's acceptance of the "right of return" of Palestinians to Israel – a non-starter for Israel.

Meshal's rejectionist declaration came just days before he was scheduled to travel, as the head of a Hamas delegation, to Moscow to meet with high-ranking Russian officials who were trying to reassure the West of their confidence in being able to prevail upon Hamas to "moderate."

As of this writing, the Hamas-Russian meeting is mere days away. Yet it would almost certainly defy everything Hamas officials have been saying to assume that Russia will have any success in moving the group to conform to the preconditions set out by the international Quartet (of which Russia is a member, along with the United States, the United Nations and the European Union) for negotiations with Hamas.

What Russia is really aiming at, many believe, is to develop its own influence in the Middle East against that of the United States at a time when U.S. power in the region seems to be faltering.

In the meantime, Iran's ambitions continue to grow, not only with Syria and Hamas, but also in Iraq, where it reportedly continues to consolidate its influence in the Shiite-dominated south.

Segev observed that with Iraq "facing civil war and a possible disintegration into three separate ethnic entities" – Sunni, Kurd and Shiite – Iran was able to orchestrate the recent visit to Damascus of the radical Iraqi Shiite militia leader Nokteda al-Sadr. His mission? According to Segev, it was to lay "the grounds for a future Syrian-Iraqi rapprochement."

In short, the rise of Hamas has occasioned or been accompanied by the strengthening of the Iranian-Syria-Hezbollah alliance and the forging of a possible new one, an Iranian-backed Iraqi-Syrian relationship.

Israel is confident it can deal with a Hamas-led Palestinian government. More troublesome is what's developing elsewhere on its borders.

Clinton 'shocked' by riots in Muslim world over cartoons

Clinton, who was president from 1992 to 2000, said he was "shocked and profoundly disappointed" over recent riots in the Muslim world in response to the Danish Muhammad cartoons, not because he doesn't believe in freedom of the press, "but because I would never do anything that blasphemes someone else's faith."

He said the first person who called him to speak out against the cartoons was Edgar Bronfman, head of the World Jewish Congress.

Clinton said the caricatures were a "perfect opportunity" for dialogue with Muslims, but one that was "colossally blown."

He also noted a rise in Muslim-on-Muslim violence, beginning with last November's deadly bombings of hotels in Amman, Jordan, where "100 per cent of the victims were Muslim."

Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the Sunni leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, took credit for the blasts, and Clinton said the act was an expression of a basic disagreement al-Zarqawi has with Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden.

He said al-Zarqawi intended to launch a new front in the war against infidels by first killing all Shia Muslims and moderate Sunnis, then training his bombs on the West.

Clinton had kind words for Canada, calling it a "fully textured democracy."

Turning to Iran, the former president said there are "no easy options." Iran is much bigger and much more powerful than Iraq and represents a "very dangerous situation," he said.

Western powers "have to be very firm but also not confuse the legitimate desires of the people in Iran to improve their lives with the illegitimate desire of the president to deny the historical reality of Holocaust.

"In other words, this is not going to be an easy walk into the future."

On the other hand, Clinton believes the 21st century will be less bloody than the 20th was.

"We have to be faithful to our values, be realistic about understanding where people are coming from [and] and always be willing to put ourselves in others' shoes."

> Iran is much bigger and much more powerful than Iraq and represents a 'very dangerous situation'

But he warned against religious extremism.

"All these people who are using religion as an excuse to give them political power and legitimize terror, every one of them is committing a fundamental error.

"Whether you're a Jew, Muslim or Christian, particularly if you're part of the monotheistic tradition, it is a heresy to claim to be in possession of the absolute truth. If you're in possession of the absolute truth and you can turn it into an absolutely true political program, which gives you heaven on Earth, what do you need God for?"

Rabbi Marvin Hier, dean and founder of the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Center called Clinton "a great friend of Israel and the Jewish community."

Clinton, it was noted, presented famed Nazi hunter Simon Wiesenthal the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 2000.

Organizers said the evening raised $1.3 million for Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies.

Montreal Jews voice outrage at Halimi memorial

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — As thousands took to the streets of Paris Feb. 26 to decry the anti-Semitic murder of Ilan Halimi, more than 400 like-minded Montreal Jews gathered the same evening in anger and sorrow to voice their solidarity with the Jews of France and their own outrage over the brutality of the crime.

In the presence of French Vice-consul Denis François, Rabbi Reuben Poupko of Beth Israel Beth Aaron Congregation asked a standing-room only audience at the Gelber Conference Centre rhetorically whether Chirac helped stoke a culture of anti-Semitism that led to the killing by honouring Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat throughout his "life and death."

"We have a right to know whether he created a climate where Jews can be murdered," Rabbi Poupko said angrily. "We have a right to ask that question."

Halimi, 23, was abducted for ransom by a gang that tortured him for more than three weeks before leaving him to die manacled beside some train tracks near Paris.

After initially hesitating, French officials now call the crime an act of anti-Semitism. French President Jacques Chirac, Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin and Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy have all done so.

The gang, named the Barbarians, reportedly kidnapped Halimi because he was Jewish and they thought his family would have money. According to some reports, he was the sixth Jew targeted by the gang in eight abduction attempts.

Last week, Youssouf Fofana, the gang's alleged leader, admitted he took part in kidnapping Halimi, but said he didn't kill him. He spoke from jail in the Ivory Coast, where he fled after the murder.

Organizers of the Montreal memorial had to search for extra chairs after at least 400 people – double the expected number – turned up for the service, which was organized jointly by Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q), and the Communauté Sépharade Unifiée du Québec (CSUQ).

The predominantly francophone audience lit candles, stood for a minute of silence, and remained hushed as psalms were recited. They reacted with applause as Jewish community leaders and politicians denounced the crime and called for renewed vigilance against anti-Semitism and all forms of racism and intolerance.

One of the speakers, Laval West Liberal MP Raymonde Folco, noted that her own family was "ravaged" during the Holocaust, and she rued the fact that humanity has yet to learn to live "side-by-side" in mutual respect and tolerance.

"If I had to write a letter to Ilan's parents, it would be to express the hope that Ilan's life will not have been in vain," she said.

Folco also said it's not enough to treat the "symptoms" that led to this type of crime, but also the "root causes."

She said in addition to the tragedy that befell Halimi and his family, "we also have the tragedy of the lost dreams of the family of the youths who committed such a crime."

In an interview, Rabbi Poupko scoffed at the "root causes" notion, characterizing Halimi's alleged murderers as Muslim extremists who quoted the Qur'an over the telephone to his family while they held him captive.

"Everyone knows suicide bombers do not come from the poor," he said The CJN. "We're fighting against something bigger here than unemployment."

In his remarks, Elie Benchetrit, the CSUQ's public relations director, said that since the second intifadah began in 2000, European anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism have gradually increased, and have been part of a movement to delegitimize Israel and the Jewish people.

"The death of young Ilan should serve as a necessary wake-up call to all those who share the values of tolerance and respect and on which the future of our civilization depends," Benchetrit said.

Rabbi Jacob Levy, of the Congrégation sépharade Beth Rambam, saw the crime as a return to the "gloominess and darkness" of the Middle Ages.

But while those responsible should face quick and severe justice, "there should be no violent words, burned down mosques, or anti-Muslim slogans," Rabbi Levy said.

Others speakers included student Ilana Chriqui, whose voice choked as she spoke of Halimi's suffering, which she said "transcends imagination."

The perpetrators sought to strip Halimi of his dignity, but in fact, she said, addressing the perpetrators, "you had none of your own."

She vowed that Jews "will not give up" and "not be silenced" in their quest to live in a world marked by tolerance and human understanding.

"The world promised us 'Never again,' but we know that promise was hollow," she said.

Sexuality, Jewish ethics discussed at Hillel

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

About 10 students gathered last week to discuss Jewish ethics and sexuality to kick off Jewish Pride Week at the University of Toronto.

Rabbinical student Judith Levitt, 29, from the Leo Baeck College Centre for Jewish Education in the United Kingdom, led the first session in the lecture series for Jewish students, which was organized by Hillel of Greater Toronto and held at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life.

"I wanted to give people a forum to talk about the values in a Jewish environment, in a non-judgmental environment, where they can be honest and open about the reality of their life, but still consider Jewish values," Levitt said in an interview with The CJN.

She added that while there may be a lot of information about Jewish sexuality, most of it is very traditional and it's mostly aimed at educating teens.

Levitt said there isn't enough information for Jewish adults who want to explore their sexuality, and she hoped her discussion, titled "Sex and the Sabbath," would address issues that are not often talked about.

The students spoke candidly about the issue of Jewish ethics, intimacy and sex, and shared with the group their struggles of trying to incorporate each into their lives.

"I think there is a level of intimacy within ethics," said one of the students in attendance. "Let's say you tell someone, 'I love you and I want to have a relationship with you,' and then you have sex with them and the next day, you say, 'I'm not really into you.' That's not very ethical. You're taking advantage of someone."

He said that people should give their partners the same respect they would give anyone else.

"Any relationship between two people is a microcosm of people's relationships with everybody," he said.

Another student added that the way you treat your significant other says a lot about the kind of person you are as a whole. If you're not going to be respectful to your partner, you probably won't be respectful to other people in your life.

"You can't separate one thing from the other. You are either respectful all the time or you're not."

Levitt said the way to a fulfilling, respectable sex life is to include Jewish morals and ethics into decision-making.

"If Judaism is central to someone's life, it will be central to the decisions they make sexually," said Levitt, who will be returning to study in the United Kingdom next year.

She said that her motivation to run the session was to inform Jews that they don't have to give in to societal pressures to have casual sex, and that they can apply Jewish morals when making decisions about sexuality.

"What I would really want to do is encourage people to consider something more meaningful than what mainstream TV and mainstream culture are presenting. I don't want [to tell people] this is the way you need to lead your sex life, but I want people to think about what is meaningful and well thought out."

She said while each situation differs from another, when entering a sexual relationship, it's important to consider how to treat your partner with respect.

"Sex can be very impulsive, and so it is important for all of us to be thinking about these things if we find ourselves in this situation."

Levitt added that she feels people need to place more significance on sex and not be so flippant about the act.

"Elevating sex so it becomes something holy, and God is present [is very important]."

Learning how to treat a partner is one thing, but people must also know how to stay true to themselves, she said.

"You need to listen to yourself if you've got doubts or you're feeling uncomfortable in any way. You need to respect yourself... To check in with the other person and communicate – make sure there is a dialogue between the two of you, that you feel safe and comfortable with the person you're with and with yourself."

Other lectures included in the series which ran from Feb. 27 to March 3, were "Our ResponsABILITY: Darfur," by Avrum Rosensweig, and "An Advertising Guru's Journey Through Kabbalah," by Syd Kessler.

Speaking of education…

Editorial

People often ask where we get the ideas for the articles we write.

Many of the articles in this supplement were percolating for months, sometimes in the form of intense, ongoing discussions like the ones that relate to the future of Jewish day schools.

Others, like the role fun plays in the classroom, have seeped into our consciousness more gradually. After hearing the occasional report about classes that were both memorable and effective because of an unexpectedly playful component, we thought it might be – well – fun – to explore this topic.

Likewise, the appropriateness of taking students out of their peer group to better meet their individual needs arose repeatedly in interviews and casual conversations over the past year. Although the "peer group" article deals with elementary and high school students, adults readers may find themselves thinking about their own life changes, or be inspired to enrich their familiar environment.

Educators often talk about fostering a lifelong love of learning, and about teaching students, not curricula. We hope that this supplement will contribute, at least in a modest way, to your own lifelong learning, and provide ideas that will contribute to memorable discussions.

Federation task force looks at support for day schools

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Longtime community volunteers Morris Perlis and Lou Greenbaum have been asking a lot of questions about Jewish day school education recently.

The co-chairs of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's task force on Jewish education are leading a small committee of about half a dozen people in an effort to study the role of the federation in how it funds and supports day schools.

Committee members have already spoken to representatives of 17 local Jewish day schools and have started to contact people from other communities – mostly in the United States – about their experience being involved in the day school system, said Perlis in a recent interview, explaining that Toronto is "fairly familiar" with the Canadian approaches.

"We're looking at the money being spent, and trying to see if in fact there are other kinds of models for funding. Are there ways of being more effective and/or more efficient in spending in support of Jewish education?… Can we get as many young children as possible in day school?"

Although Perlis was reluctant to discuss specifics of the task force's work, he said he was hopeful that it would "come up with a thoughtful series of alternatives to be considered, to see how funding might be even more effective than it is already.

"We're trying to be proactive and look at the big issues of the community for the future," he said.

"There's a great belief in the value of Jewish education and certainly of day school… We want to see if there are ways to increase the number of kids who go for day school education in a cost-effective way, and see that as many families as possible can afford it."

Toronto currently has 11,130 students in Jewish day schools. Of the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education's annual $12 million budget, approximately $8 million goes toward tuition subsidies.

The number of students in the system overall has been "fairly stable," said Perlis, noting that a decrease over the past year or two at the elementary level was attributable to demographics (fewer children of that age than in previous years) and was anticipated in the results of a demographic study done for the federation three years ago.

"The high school level has been strong and consistent," he noted.

The task force expects to finish its research by late spring, but its impact will not be immediate, as next year's BJE budget will already be set, said Perlis. Also, the results will have to be analyzed and discussed, he added.

Extracurricular activities are a family affair

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Extracurricular activities, especially those that take up to 15 or 20 hours a week, are a family affair, agree a number of Toronto-area mothers.

"I'm committed to supporting my daughter – I support her passion," says Gloria Riesel, whose 15-year-old daughter Jordana dances "at least" 15 hours a week.

Jordana, who does jazz, acro dance, ballet and tap, began dancing at age four. She has danced competitively for 10 years, and has participated in a number of competitions in Canada and the United States.

A highlight of her "career," says Riesel, was a trip to Miami to take part in the Orange Bowl Parade. "It was a commitment, though. We had to pay for travel expenses, hotel, food, costumes and the entry fee. She has to love it."

A challenge for Jordana, says Riesel, is keeping up with her Grade 10 schoolwork – she attends Westmount Collegiate Institute in Thornhill – "but she manages. She does homework during lunch on dance days, and sometimes she's up until midnight. It's working though – she's an honour-roll student.

"School is a priority, but dance has given her the ability to manage her time. When you enjoy something, there is always time.

"What she has missed, though, are a lot of social functions [such as] family dinners, birthday parties and bar mitzvahs. She never complains. It's her dream, and I'm behind her."

Riesel says, however, that is she is realistic about Jordana's future in dance. "At this point I'm taking it year by year. If schoolwork ever falls behind, we'll re-evaluate.

"She's still a 15-year-old girl. When she takes off her dance costume and makeup, she's an ordinary teenager. Things could change."

Meanwhile, she says, the dance community is like her family, says Riesel. "I've made good friends. We see each other socially because we have a lot in common – we're committed to dance."

Rebeca Bookman, 15, a Grade 10 student at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), has also been dancing since she was four years old. She now does ballet and tap about six hours a week, and spends another six pursuing such interests as school theatre.

"I did do competitive dancing for two years but gave it up because I decided that ultimately, school is more important.

"If I have a lot of homework, I stay home from dance. It's not the other way around."

She was inspired, she says, by Betty Oliphant, co-founder of the National Ballet School. "She said [in her autobiography Miss O, My Life in Dance] that she was interested in starting the school, because when she was a dancer she missed too much school for dance. She didn't want that for others.

"I always kept that in mind. It's important to dance, but it's also important to keep things in perspective.

"I have one friend whose mother wants her to try out for the National Ballet School, and my friend always worries about her weight even though she's thin.

"Others don't come home until 11 p.m. from rehearsals, and only then start their homework. I don't want that."

Rebeca's mother, Karen, says she's proud of her daughter for making such a decision. "The most important thing is that dance should be fun. If it gets out of hand, it's not fun any more."

Nancy Green, whose 14-year-old son Mathew plays AAA hockey in Richmond Hill, says "hockey is definitely a priority right now. Mathew is on the ice at least five times a week, and that often includes evening trips to Barrie, Peterborough or Orillia."

She's fortunate, she says, that her husband is as committed as her son. "I just couldn't do such driving, but if Mathew wants to play, a parent has to commit as well."

A Grade 9 student, Mathew keeps up with "most" of his homework, says Green, but "isn't a strong student in the best of times. I don't believe he'd be doing much more work even if he had the time.

"I support the hockey because it keeps Mathew busy and focused on something worthwhile. At that age, a lot of his friends go to the mall or the corner store and hang out."

Like Riesel, however, she does say that she'll take it year by year. "He won't stop playing, but if he can't keep up with school, we'll think about dropping back to play A or select hockey."

When Kupperman was only 13 when his parents brought him from Israel to Canada to study at York University, where he is now an undergraduate majoring in mathematics.

Although he misses his friends in Israel and is in touch with them daily, there was no question that his educational needs had to be met and could not be met locally, said his mother Sara.

"If you have a child that wants to go after his heart and his talent, you have to let them do it," she said. "I would tell people whose kids don't feel stimulated at school and who don't enjoy being there to look for a different place. Don't just settle and say, 'Maybe he doesn't like the subject.'"

Chen says the ideal situation would be to take university classes in the afternoon and stay with same-age friends in the morning, but that option isn't always available.

"When you're a kid, you want to be with your own age, unless you're extremely bored."

In university, his older classmates are initially surprised when they find out how old he is, but then "they forget about it," he said.

When things go well, students like him come to see some of their classmates almost as "older brothers," he said.

He would suggest that young students who are very advanced academically, and considering the type of move he made, try out some classes to see whether they are a good fit academically, and get to know some students who are in the class.

"Don't rush. Try it out, but don't automatically say yes or no."

The key for parents who must decide whether or not to remove a child from his or her peer group – for whatever reason – is to "really listen" to what their children are saying, according to Joanne Foster, gifted education consultant for UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE) and co-author of the award-winning Being Smart about Gifted Children: A Guidebook for Parents and Educators.

Foster, who also teaches educational psychology and gifted education at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education of the University of Toronto, said that "if you can accomplish what you need to in terms of being able to give a child an appropriate program that addresses their strengths, weaknesses and interests while keeping the child in an inclusive setting where they're with friends and people they're comfortable with, I don't see the point in pulling them out."

Chen Kupperman

But if a child is not "happily productive" or functioning well, then steps must be taken either to train the teacher to meet special needs within the classroom context – an area Foster specializes in, in her work with the BJE – or to "rethink the placement," she said.

Often, she said, students thrive in a new environment that better meets their educational needs. But for others, being in their own neighbourhood or staying at a particular Jewish day school is the right answer, provided the teacher can offer what is needed academically, she said.

"It's a case by case basis."

Foster suggests that parents ask themselves questions like the following before deciding to remove a child from his or her peer group:

- How resilient is the child?
- What sorts of buffers are in place? Will they be moving with a friend, for example?
- Is it a transition time in any case (for example, if children are going into Grade 1 or starting junior high)?
- How willing is the child to do this?

The issues should be discussed among parents, teachers and children, she said. "You want everybody to be on board, so it becomes a positive kind of situation. There has to be a lot of support for a child around the adjustment process. You want to make sure the expectations are reasonable, so that the child doesn't all of a sudden go into a situation and find it really daunting – that they can't keep up with the workload, for example.

"You also want to make sure that the new environment is going to be one where there are other people they can connect with, who have shared interests."

To facilitate the adjustment, she advises that parents remain attentive to clues such as changes in eating and sleeping patterns, or other behavioural indicators that might result from difficulty in adjusting to the new situation.

Acceleration is a good way for some children "to move forward intellectually and feel good about themselves instead of being bored and frustrated," said Foster.

According to a recent study (A Nation Deceived: How Schools Hold Back America's Brightest Students, available online at www.nationdeceived.org), academic acceleration is "the easiest and most effective way to help highly capable students."

'Consider whether child is in the right school or program'

The study, which refers to 18 kinds of acceleration, said that accelerated students feel academically challenged and socially accepted.

For Jennifer Gould Keil, a 38-year-old journalist in New York who skipped two grades ahead by the time she was in Grade 2, there was never an issue about not being with children her own age when she was growing up in Toronto.

"I was so young, it wasn't difficult. I looked like the kids who were two years older, and I was never friends with kids my own age."

She suspects, however, that it is easier for girls to advance a grade or two, particularly when they become teenagers and may be interested in dating.

"I'm so glad that I did it, because I wouldn't have had anything in common with kids my age. It kept me stimulated, and not bored."

* * *

Clinical psychologist Alan Bardikoff, who also does educational assessments, says the advantage in accelerating children at a young age is that they have more time to adjust.

Students who skip from Grade 6 to Grade 8, for example, have "one less year of figuring out teenage challenges before they're thrust into a very different environment where they are expected to be more independent and do more work. Also, they're often looking at each other through different lenses, and [may be] attracted to each other physically and emotionally."

But, said Bardikoff, the criteria for advancing or holding back a student is "always dependent upon the individual's circumstances."

He is "probably more comfortable" with the idea of advancing students, compared to holding them back a year, because of possible self-esteem issues.

Sometimes, for example with young children born in December who may not be ready to proceed to the next grade, holding them back a year "makes a lot of sense," Bardikoff said.

But in the older grades, "one has to consider whether an extra year really means getting something different, or whether it means repeating the same experience.

Jennifer Gould Keil

"I will ask a parent to consider whether their child is in the right school or program. More isn't necessarily better."

* * *

In high school, now that the OAC year has been abolished in Ontario, some parents are concerned about whether their children are ready for university at a younger age than previous freshman students.

At the same time, students and their parents may be reluctant to put university off a year while classmates are proceeding to campus.

"In the public school system, many high schools encourage students to consider taking [an extra year]," said Bardikoff.

Also, he added, because there is less flexibility in the current curriculum, students must make choices at the end of Grade 10. "If they make the wrong choices, they need to reconsider taking an extra year or half year to make up what they've missed.

But even for students going to university at the same time as their friends, the peer group may be a significant consideration.

Educational consultant Judy Libman of Ambitions Educational Consulting said it's "not that rare" for students to not even consider a university that their friends are not going to.

"I do worry that students are so risk-averse that they narrow down their options, [particularly if] they won't try things based on their own interests.

"In some cases, they aren't sure what their own interests are, but they find that group comfort zone and it doesn't always fit."

In the Jewish community, Libman said, "most kids want to be in a place where they'll have some kind of Jewish social life, which I think is important."

But there are "good schools that Jewish kids won't consider going to," among them universities with "thriving, small Jewish populations."

She encourages students to think about university as a place where they will be challenged with new ideas and meet people who are different from them.

Salary seen as a major factor in retaining Jewish teachers

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Rising tuition and declining enrolment are not the only problems facing North American Jewish day schools.

The recruitment and retention of teachers is also becoming more of an issue, as young Jewish educators are opting to take higher-paying jobs in administration or other fields.

Rabbi Dan Rand, managing director of Aish Toronto, is a former full-time teacher at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto who still teaches a one-hour class three times a week.

He said his salary was one of the major reasons he left CHAT six years ago, after teaching for three years.

"It is definitely an inhibitor for someone with a big family, unless your wife is working too," he said, adding that pay increases for teachers "would be a great step in the right direction."

"They want to be on par with what public school teachers make, and at the same time they want someone totally committed to Judaism."

He said it's easier for a secular teacher to live on a $70,000 salary, because they may not keep kosher, have a big family with four to six kids, and observe all the holidays.

"I've seen very good, young teachers that end up leaving because the pay is too low," Rabbi Rand said.

Donald Sylvan, president and COO of the New York-based Jewish Education Service of North America (JESNA), said low pay is just one of many factors keeping good, young Jewish educators away.

"Prestige is part of it, [as are] financial remuneration [and] stability of benefits. If we could solve these three problems, we'd be in good shape," Sylvan said.

"These are critical factors in understanding what the problem is. We've got an idea of what the factors are, and we're working on addressing them," he added.

Three years ago, people from academic agencies around the world gathered at a summit in Florida to talk about recruiting and retaining Jewish teachers.

In April 2003, the Covenant Foundation and JESNA launched the Jewish Educator Recruitment/Retention Initiative (JERRI) to recruit Jewish educators, change the culture and structure of the education system, and research and understand the challenges in recruiting and retaining teachers.

Western communities fund prospective Jewish teachers

While low pay, lack of job stability and few or no benefits are three of the main reasons educators opt to leave the Jewish education system, Sylvan said accommodating teachers is also important.

"We don't always treat teachers the right way," he said.

In response, JESNA and the Covenant Foundation have created mentorship programs in hopes of "nurturing new teachers correctly," by partnering them with more experienced teachers who can show them the ropes and make them feel comfortable, Sylvan said.

Rory Paul, head of school at Gray Academy of Jewish Education in Winnipeg, which has students in junior kindergarten through high school, said that in response to the challenge of finding young, qualified Judaic studies teachers, his school has started encouraging students to enter the field.

Five years ago, the Jewish communities of Winnipeg, Calgary, Vancouver and Edmonton formed a Western Canadian coalition that provides Jewish students with scholarships to York University's Jewish education program – on the condition that upon completing the program, they teach at one of four Jewish day schools in Western Canada for a minimum of two years.

This year, however, the coalition didn't get enough funds from donors to send a student, Paul said.

He believes that part of the reason few students opt to become Jewish teachers is because their parents discourage them from doing so.

"The parental mindset is that children should be pushed into traditional professions, because teaching is seen as a pseudo-profession."

He said his school has managed to hold on to its Jewish educators with benefits and comparatively high salaries that average $70,000 "which is high in Winnipeg dollars" – but he worries about replacing teachers who will soon retire.

"As our teachers age and retire, replacing them will be an onerous task. With a small Jewish population, we have less to draw on," Paul said.

Paul sees the problem as a North American one, and he is taking it upon himself to "create a school environment that will entice teachers to want to be a part of Jewish education."

Rabbi Rand said the key to improving the Jewish school system and addressing the shortage of Jewish educators is to increase wages.

"They will always be able to fill the ranks, but will they be getting the best quality? The question is, how important is the quality of education to the community?" Rabbi Rand said.

"If you want sterling education, you have to pay for it. Jewish teachers are very dedicated, but you are obviously going to get better quality if you pay for it."

Congress developing strategy to lobby for school funding

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The next provincial election in Ontario is scheduled for October 2007, and there's a good chance that funding for independent religious schools will be a hot-button campaign issue.

Soon after being elected in 2003, Dalton McGuinty's Liberals repealed the Equity in Education Tax Credit introduced by the previous Progressive Conservative (PC) government – going so far to make the decision retroactive. In recent weeks, Ontario PC leader John Tory has restated his commitment to finding a way to help parents with children in independent and private schools.

The issue is one of "fairness... for independent schools," Tory told reporters at a policy conference last month in Niagara Falls.

Ontario holds the distinction among all Canadian provinces of funding the schools of one religious group Roman Catholic – while refusing to fund the schools of all other religions, including Jews, Protestants and Muslims.

In the 1996 "Adler" decision, the Supreme Court of Canada upheld the constitutionality of the funding practice, but the High Court also stated there was nothing to prevent the government of Ontario from funding the schools of other religions as well.

Canadian Jewish Congress joined a number of Jewish parents at the Supreme Court in arguing for equity in education funding, but the community's political lobbying efforts go back even further. For decades, Jewish leaders have described public funding for Jewish day schools as one of the most important issues facing the Jewish community in Ontario, and various organization over the years have lobbied a succession of Ontario governments on the issue.

Last fall, Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region, which has been the organized community's main advocacy voice on the issue, hired Jesse Guberman as an education policy advisor with the mandate of putting together a long-term strategic plan to advance the community's position on funding.

Guberman said he is still in the midst of his work. "There is a strategy taking shape, but it's not one we're releasing yet," he said.

In the few months he's been on the job, Guberman has consulted with "stakeholders" in the current system – schools, parents, former Congress staff familiar with the issue, the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE) and federated Jewish communities in Ontario that provide some funding to local Jewish schools. (Tuition fees are the main source of funds. They can range from about $10,000 to $15,000 per student at Jewish day schools in Toronto).

There are something like 45 Jewish schools in Ontario that would benefit from government funding, and all were invited to a mid-January breakfast meeting at the Congress' offices in the Lipa Green Building. Representatives who couldn't attend were linked up by teleconference, Guberman said.

Guberman acknowledges that trying to create a consensus among so many diverse institutions and individuals has been difficult. "If we can get buy-in on our strategy and some general ideas on what that strategy will look like, then we can move forward," he said.

There is a general agreement that a long-term solution to funding difficulties could be addressed through government funding, but how to advance that agenda is still up in the air. In addition, any solution to the community's funding woes must be a long-term one. No one wants to see a reprise of the Liberals' gutting of the previous government's funding plan and all the hardship that created, he said.

Guberman said the Liberals and New Democrats appear philosophically opposed to government funding, and based on the attitude of Ontario voters, it doesn't appear they will pay a political price for that position. But he's hopeful a solution can be crafted that addresses the parties' concerns.

One of the attitudes that will need to be addressed is one often expressed by the provincial party leaders, who contend that public education must remain their top funding priority, he noted.

"We have to find a way to engage the general public on this and show we want fairness when it comes to education in this province," Guberman said.

The current practice should offend Ontarians' sensibilities on questions of fairness and equity. "It's about [government] treating our children as second-class citizens when everyone should be treated equally," Guberman said.

Canadians hold dear the values of fairness, inclusiveness and diversity, yet "by funding other religion, are you supporting the values of diversity we all purport to embrace?" he asked.

Guberman said when the consultation process concludes, the community will co-ordinate its efforts with other communities that are also eager to see a change in the status quo.

Day schools face rising costs – and expectations

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The most recent edition of Our Associated Press, the newsletter of the Associated Hebrew Schools' parent teacher council, features two items that reflect not only the situation at that particular Jewish day school, but point to front-burner issues in the field of Jewish education today.

The first, and most prominent, is news of a "momentous" – and unspecified – donation by philanthropist Gerda Frieberg to provide tuition subsidies.

The other item – an eye-catching little feature called "Parking Lot Rumour" – pits "rumour" against "reality." In this case, the rumour concerns Associated "losing students to other schools at a very high rate."

The newsletter categorically states that the rumour is false. For the 2005-06 school year, it says, the school's retention rate rose by nearly two percentage points, to 94 per cent, over the previous year.

Attracting and retaining students, and the related issue of how to ease the tuition burden on parents, are perhaps the two biggest challenges facing administrators at Toronto's Jewish day schools.

"I believe that contrary to the United States, [in Canada] cost is at the forefront of a larger percentage of families who are interested in the day school system, but are not in it at the moment," said Mark Smiley, Associated's director of education.

In Canada, he said, Jewish day schools were viewed for a long time as "Jewish public schools," but for a number of reasons, including the "spiralling costs" of day school education, Smiley thinks that era is coming to an end. "I believe parents are expecting higher standards, smaller class sizes and many of the amenities of independent schools."

In the United States, many Jewish day schools no longer see public schools as their main competition, he noted. Instead, they are competing with local private schools, said Smiley, an Associated alumnus who headed a day school in Michigan before returning to his hometown in 2003.

Paul Shaviv

Yet, despite what some see as pressure on Jewish day schools to be more like pricier private schools, accessibility is still an important issue for the organized Jewish community, as it is at schools such as Associated and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

High school tuition at CHAT is $15,150 this year. At schools such as Associated, Bialik Hebrew Day School, Eitz Chaim Day School, Leo Baeck Day School and Netivot HaTorah Day School, annual tuition hovers around the $10,000 mark for students in elementary and middle school. The Toronto Heschel School, which boasts small classes and an arts-based program, is more expensive, with tuition ranging from $12,500 in the lower grades to $13,000 at the middle school level.

CHAT, with more than 1,400 students at two campuses, "never turns down a student because of genuine inability to pay," says Paul Shaviv, the school's director of education.

The school recently launched a legacy endowment fund, "one of whose long-term aims is to help fund tuition assistance through endowment income."

A UJA Federation of Greater Toronto task force is studying how to best support Jewish day schools in order to maximize the number of students who are able to attend them. (Please see story on page B2.)

Of the BJE's annual $12-million budget, approximately $8 million goes toward tuition subsidies.

The subsidy application process, however, is not ideal.

Rabbi Eliot Feldman, vice-principal of the Toronto Heschel School, went through it as a parent.

"I educated four kids, and all were on tuition assistance, because I could not afford to send the kids to the schools I taught at," Rabbi Feldman said. "While the schools were very nice, it's not pleasant to have to put your finances in front of someone else."

Affordability is "a huge issue," especially for the middle class, said Lucy Cohen, head of school at United Synagogue Day School.

As a firm believer in the value of Jewish day schools because of the "work-study ethic" fostered there and the integration of Jewish and general studies, Cohen believes it's important for community and schools to work together to reach out to families whose children are not getting a Jewish education.

Private donations like Frieberg's to Associated may be the way of the future for Jewish schools. A recent $15-million (US) gift to the Charles E. Smith Jewish Day School in suburban Washington, D.C., announced in January, set "a new bar for investment in day schools and for reasons to invest," Rabbi Joshua Elkin, executive director of the Project for Excellence in Jewish Education, told JTA at the time. The gift included $10 million for educational programs and a $5 million matching endowment for scholarships.

'The only long-term solution is endowment funding'

In Cleveland, Ohio, two Jewish day schools were able to cut their tuition almost in half by bumping up their revenue through private philanthropy, federation funding and voluntary contributions from parents. The program, now in its second year, is expected to continue for at least eight to 10 years – longer if it's deemed successful, according to Gary Gross, president of the Jewish Education Centre of Cleveland.

So far, there has been an increase in transfers of new students from local public schools from fewer than half a dozen before the new funding to 18 or 20 now, said Gross. Also, he added, the student retention rate has increased from about 90 per cent to about 95 per cent.

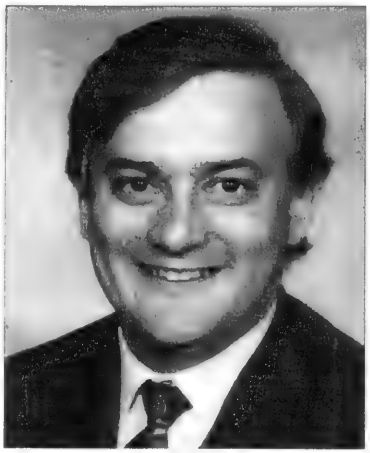
While some educators contend the rising cost of tuition at Jewish day schools has reached crisis proportions, others, like CHAT's Shaviv would venture to say that "perhaps value is more significant than cost to many parents."

In that context, he noted, day schools like his own are increasingly being called upon to provide services that extend beyond the classroom. For some parents, he said, it seems Jewish schools have "replaced the synagogue as the primary institution of Jewish family connection."

At CHAT, Jewish studies staff in particular have been called on for pastoral services in situations that have included death in the family.

• • •

According to statistics from the BJE, whose senior representatives could not be reached for comment, the percentage of school-age children enrolling in Jewish day schools is increasing, although the actual number of students in grades 1 through 8 is slightly down, because of a lower community birthrate.



Mark Smiley

It's difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain how many Jewish students – that is, potential Jewish day school students – are at non-Jewish private schools. Certainly, many are at public schools, whether for financial reasons or not.

But tuition per se is not the only financially pressing issue.

"I think every school, not only in Toronto but across North America, understands that as Jewish schools attracted more and more students from wider circles, so the demands on the schools to be more professional institutions housed in better facilities grew and grew… That has a cost attached to it," said Shaviv.

Because of "the costs of providing the quality of educational programming and facilities that is legitimately expected by today's parents," including rising teachers' salaries, the cost of Jewish education has "risen considerably," he added.

CHAT is building a new site at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's new Vaughan site, as is United Synagogue Day School. The schools are scheduled to open in 2007 and 2008 respectively.

USDS is also embarking on a renovation project at its Bathurst campus; Bialik Hebrew Day School finished a major renovation in 2003; and the Toronto Heschel School is consolidating its two campuses next year into one former public school building that needs to be modified to suit the school's needs.

"Ultimately most schools agree that the only long-term solution is building up endowment funding," said Shaviv.

At Associated, where more than 600 children out of a total of about 1,700 receive tuition assistance at three campuses, the challenge is to try and balance the school's commitment to "excellence in education" with its commitment to accessibility, said Smiley.

Frieberg's gift is "an incredible sign of encouragement," said Smiley. It will enable 45 students to attend the school by offsetting a portion of their tuition.

Smiley noted, however, that there are many more students who are able to attend the school only with financial assistance.

Homeschooling a small but growing movement

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It was more than 10 years ago when music teacher Sarah Feuerstein noticed something special about some of her young students.

A number of them, she recalled, were more enthusiastic than their peers. They showed a "thirst for knowledge," were mature for their age and were "much more adjusted as far as society goes."

Then it struck her: the one element those students shared in common was that they were all homeschooled.

The homeschooled youngsters were "active learners" and "always curious," unlike most of the public school kids, who sat quietly and passively, expecting to be told what to do, she recalled.

That got her thinking. Maybe her own two sons might benefit from homeschooling. Although her oldest boy rejected the idea – he wanted to remain in school with his buddies – her younger son, Benjamin, was open to the idea.

From grades 5 through 8, Benjamin was homeschooled, returning to the public system for Grade 9, when the desire to be part of a group was too strong to resist.

While he was being homeschooled, Feuerstein said she enthusiastically threw herself "into the whole thing."

She found a list of support groups in Canada and eventually became associated with various associations that promote homeschooling and provide mutual support, such as the Ontario Federation of Teaching Parents.

Over time she created a Jewish homeschool support group (http://groups.yahoo.com/group/jhsc/), which includes 24 Canadian families spread out across the country. Like homeschoolers everywhere, they trade information, provide helpful hints and give updates about new developments.

She found there was no shortage of teaching materials and resources available, including math books that she said are much more effective than those in the public system.

Feuerstein readily accepted the philosophy of homeschooling, which is "to allow natural learning" and not necessarily "produce little geniuses" who outperform kids in public or private schools.

That may mean accelerated learning for some, or slower learning in some subjects for others.

In investigating the homeschool movements, she learned original homeschoolers were largely Christian evangelicals, but the movement had expanded to include numerous secular parents who believed they could provide an enhanced educational experience for their children right at home.

Feuerstein, it seems, joined the homeschooling trend just as it was gathering steam. According to a recent article in the Sunday Times of London, the number of British children taught at home has almost doubled in the past five years, echoing a trend in the United States, where five per cent of children are homeschooled.

Hebrew tutor supplemented homeschooling

A 2001 Canadian report, Home Schooling: From the Extreme to the Mainstream, estimated that 80,000 children are being educated in private homes, a figure that represents a doubling of the number "in only a few years."

The report, published by the the Fraser Institute, a free market-oriented public policy organization, noted that homeschooling is legal in all 10 Canadian provinces. Provinces, which have constitutional authority over education, regulate the practice and most provinces require parents to register their homeschooled children with their local school or school board.

Parental dissatisfaction with the public school system is the main reason for the growth of homeschooling, the report stated, along with the desire to accommodate each child's unique learning style and concerns over school safety.

Leah Freedman homeschooled her two children, Josh and Julia, for a total of five years. She started with Josh, now 21, when he was in Grade 7. The year before "he was getting stressed out at [Leo Baeck] school," she said. He loves to learn but was frustrated by the structure and regimentation common in schools, she said.

With Josh's agreement, they embarked on a two-year homeschooling experiment.

"I was very nervous about it," Freedman conceded, even though she prepared extensively to make sure it would run smoothly.

At the start of the year, she cleared a work space on the family's dining room table, obtained all the necessary textbooks and began to teach her son. Within a few weeks, she saw that Josh was not responding to the kind of structure she had created in the home so, being "a very flexible person," she took her cue from how her son learned and created a less-structured environment.

"Fortunately, I did not have a background in education, so I had no preconceptions," she said. "It was a good thing for me. It enabled me to use my imagination."

Josh and his mom adapted to an unstructured form of learning, visiting the library, reading and discussing science magazines on topics such as astronomy and exploring new ideas.

She never felt Josh was falling behind his school contemporaries. "You can tell if your child is learning by listening," she said. "If he came up with new ideas or demonstrated new skills, then I knew he was learning."

Employing the Saxon Homeschool math program helped Josh, who "ended up way ahead in math."

Seeing her brother thriving at home led Julia to request homeschooling. A year after Josh started, she began Grade 5 at home, remaining there through Grade 8. Julia enjoyed a more structured approach – checking off items covered in the day – so for her Freedman employed the Calvert School lesson plan, which provides a daily agenda of items to be covered.

Because there was so little time wasted, often Julia was finished her day's work by 1 p.m. Both kids remained active in after-school programs such as karate, where they made new friends. For Hebrew lessons, the Freedmans sent their children to a tutor.

Both kids returned to the Jewish day school system at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) for Grade 9, when the need to be part of a group beckoned.

Two of Jerry Moscovitch's four children were homeschooled after unsatisfactory experiences in the public and private school systems.

His daughter, Kyra, 12, was homeschooled for two years before finding a public school that would accommodate her sports training schedule. Her 14-year-old brother, Mischa, is in his third year of homeschooling.

Kyra is a nationally ranked figure skater – together with her brother Dylan, they are the Canadian junior pairs champs – and her previous school was "very rigid" in not allowing her to work around her training schedule, Moscovitch said.

School "was the wrong environment for [Mischa], given his personality," he added.

Moscovitch, who runs his own engineering and design firm, thought he and his wife could build a program for his children they could control and that "would educate them in a better way."

The family hired an educational consultant from the private sector who set out a curriculum and who in turn recommended private tutors.

> Skating champs' lessons were geared to their sport

Working one-on-one with the teachers has been beneficial to his children, who were able to study at their own pace and work around their sports schedules.

The kids' activities included science experiments and were project-oriented. Lessons were geared toward their sporting activities. Mischa, an accomplished tennis player, would study the physics and math about the game. Kyra would study the motions and forces involved in skating. Moscovitch said the learning style more closely resembled a university-oriented approach than one found in high schools.

Although Kyra has returned to school, with flexible hours, Moscovitch believes the homeschooling experience has been beneficial.

"I think they're more mature because of what they are doing," he said. "They are more committed... more focused" – they must be so to maintain their busy schedules, he added.

Some homeschooling factoids:

• A 1995 U.S. Department of Education study showed that when tested, children schooled at home have above-average scores.

• Lawrence Rudner of the University of Maryland measured test scores of 20,760 homeschool youths in 50 states and found in every subject and grade level, they did considerably better than public and private school students. Overall test scores for homeschoolers was in the 85th percentile in math (i.e., they scored higher than 85 per cent of their contemporaries); public school students scored in the 50th percentile.

• Having a parent who is a certified teacher had no significant effect on the achievement levels of homeschoolers. However, children of parents with university degrees perform significantly better than parents who don't have a degree.

• Canadian research data found homeschooled students scoring, on average, in the 80th percentile in reading, the 76th percentile in language, and at the 79th percentile in mathematics. The Canadian average is the 50th percentile.

• In 2001, 75 per cent of American universities accepted homeschool students.

• A 1997 U.S. study found that 98 per cent of homeschooled students are involved in two or more outside activities on a weekly basis.

• The average homeschooling family earns above-average income, has above-average levels of education, are two-parent families, have a stay-at-home mom and are above average in size (62 per cent have three or more children).

Making learning fun in Toronto's Jewish schools

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

Everyone remembers a favourite teacher – the one you worked so hard to please, the first person you look for at a reunion, the one whose class was fun, who made you laugh. Those great teachers are still around in Toronto's Jewish schools. Whether in spelling, physics or history, many students are learning with a smile.

Steve Baker, a Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) math teacher, believes classroom fun builds something much deeper – mutual trust and respect.

Baker keeps students grinning with word problems starring a dramatic cast including Elvira Beauregard and Magnolia Bulkhead. "I spend all night thinking of them."

Even his tests come with a gag: "If I think the test is going to be tough, I put on a page of jokes as the first page… I tell them, 'Start with the first page. It's very important.' That loosens them up a bit first." And yes, he gives them a mark for reading his jokes.

Much of Baker's humour is self-directed. Once, when he noticed distracted students making cartoons of him, he placed chalk around the classroom and gave them 10 minutes. "I told them, 'Nothing obscene… go up to the board and draw caricatures of me.' Some were brutal. I never knew I could be so ugly!"

Baker says "kids are more interested in knowing that you care than they are in caring what you know." This means he will tune in to other events in their lives. "There are times I'll cut class a bit short when I know they have a huge test coming up next period."

Excellent teachers don't all clown around, says Catherine Gitzel from the Teacher of Excellence Awards for Toronto's Jewish Day Schools (www.teacherawards.org), but "the majority of recipients have the word 'fun' in their nomination." Humour, she says, helps kids feel teachers know them "beyond the classroom door."

One example is 2005 winner Nadia Moldaver, who nicknames all her students. "Kids say the nicknames last for life," Gitzel says. Moldaver uses wacky spelling sentences in her Grade 5 Bialik classroom. "Kids break out laughing during dictation," Gitzel says.

Bialik teacher uses wacky spelling sentences

Moldaver, whose past students often come back for hugs, says nicknames are "a way of… allowing them to feel special." But she cautions that although breaking the ice is important, kids "can tell when you're being fake, trying too hard, probably better than adults can."

Eli Honig, a 25-year science teacher at CHAT, also believes a relaxed atmosphere helps learning sink in. "I don't like to have them in straitjackets."

Honig uses Slinkies in the classroom and pioneered physics trips to Canada's Wonderland. He believes kids appreciate your "laughing with them and at yourself."

Of the Wonderland trips, he says, at first, "the kids thought it was a con job… but it was all under the auspices of learning. There were demands placed on them.

"You have a responsibility to make sure that it goes beyond fun," he says, quoting Einstein: "'Everything should be made as simple as possible, but not simpler'… Don't compromise it by making it only fun."

Baker agrees that kids need a basic foundation, which is where the soup cans and basketballs come in. "I try to concretize things." For example, they may talk about investing bar or bat mitzvah money. Parents call him, thrilled that their kids are reading the business section.

Baker, who began his career teaching special education in the Jane-Finch area, also believes relaxation opens doors.

"Kids are uptight – 'I might make a mistake.' If you don't take risks in math and science, there are very few things you can learn." He intersperses the basics with "math tricks" and cartoons.

Humour is even more important in special education, he says. "These kids have… an uphill battle to begin with."

But even mainstream students can have "math phobias," and fun helps overcome obstacles, he says, and draw out students who "don't have a long history of overwhelming success."

Baker, whose seven years at CHAT followed 18 years at United Synagogue Day School, also runs an after-school fitness program. His message: "What's important to them is important to you. Go to school plays, drama club, committees… If the kids are putting on a talent show…show up."

Humour is 'powerful' for teachers

But he draws a careful line. "You're not their friend, you're their teacher… There are lots of ways to show you care, to create an atmosphere of mutual respect… without crossing any inappropriate boundaries."

Gitzel emphasizes that humour is just one element of a great teacher – but a powerful one. It makes "students want to keep going back. They go in anticipating humour – and also learning."

A fun teacher, she says, can change a student's mindset from "I need to get an A" to "We can enjoy this journey of education together."

Serious play at York University

Jennifer Jenson has a job my 11-year-old son would envy – she studies videogames. The assistant professor of pedagogy and technology at York University believes videogames offer students a "sandbox" – a safe place to try out new possibilities, even if those possibilities lead to failure.

"We hate failure in education," Jenson says. Playing a game, you can "try over a million times until you get it exactly the way you want it. Educators don't do that; [we] don't have time.

"Play can be fun but serious at the same time."

She has developed a game called Contagion, using a hypothetical outbreak modelled partly on SARS to teach kids about health care.

Videogames – "not shoot-em-ups," – even turn up in English classes, where students analyze their narrative as they would novels. "They're so familiar with the medium, they're actually able to be more critical."

She says "we find play scary because it goes dangerous places… but those are actually the most productive, interesting places that learning happens." She'd love to see educators creating "opportunities for these kinds of playful immersions, and not just through videogames."

Given the number of educators at a recent interdisciplinary International Conference on Digital Games Research in Vancouver, she sees a "real push to more critically and academically look at videogames – much the way we did 25 years ago with TV and film."

Teaching Israel to a new generation

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

The current generation of elementary students is unique in that many have actually been to Israel.

When he asks students how many have been, most hands go up, says Rabbi Elliot Diamond, principal of Jewish studies at Netivot HaTorah Day School. "They're familiar with parts of the land [and] may have family members living there, brothers and sisters studying in yeshiva."

Simona Dayan, Rabbi Diamond's counterpart at Bialik Hebrew Day School, says the same is true at her school. "Many have visited Israel more than once. Kids start by telling us where they've visited, where relatives live." Beginning with students' enthusiasm, she says, helps instil Israeli ruach in almost every facet of the school.

Though today's students may "have visual images in their mind," Rabbi Diamond says, and feel "more connected" than in past, their understanding isn't necessarily complete. But that emotional connection is an excellent starting point.

Both schools place Israel front and centre, despite different ideologies. With roots in Labour Zionism, Bialik emphasizes the language and culture of modern Israel. "When kids leave Bialik," Dayan says, "they have a lot of knowledge and spirit."

Despite their different approaches, an overwhelming love of Israel is tangible in both schools. From the construction-paper almond trees in Netivot's lobby, bursting with the blossoms that herald Israel's spring, to a student-built Jerusalem inside Bialik's front door, they're clearly sharing a passion that can only broaden and enhance students' own experiences.

Netivot is founded on principles of religious Zionism that hold that "the establishment of the state has political, but also religious, significance... The modern State of Israel is a homeland to the Jewish people," Rabbi Diamond says.

At the school, Israel takes on the friendly face of teachers and other dynamic religious Israelis. In addition to many resident Israelis, the teaching staff includes four pairs of shlichim – emissaries brought to Toronto by the Jewish Agency. They not only teach language, Rabbi Diamond says, but also bring "personal experiences, which they share... throughout the year – not just connected to any one curriculum topic."

They infuse the school with contemporary "attitudes, language, excitement passion," he says. Four Bnot Sherut girls, 19-year-olds performing one-year national service, tutor and offer cultural programs, exemplifying contemporary Israel, "teaching phrases that you'd hear in the Israeli streets." Two other young women from the Bnei Akiva religious youth movement teach a unique course on modern Israel.

Is early preschool necessary?

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

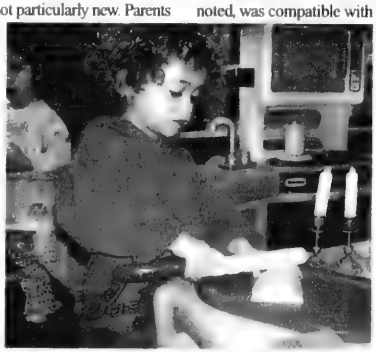
It's the first day of junior kindergarten and little Yossi or Rivkeh is excited to be there. So are you, as the day marks the start of your four-year-old's formal education.

But hold on a minute. In talking with other moms and dads, you notice that a lot of other children have been going to "school" for two years now.

Hmm. You thought you were giving your little one a healthy start by enrolling him or her in school at four, but now panic may be setting in with the thought that he or she may have fallen two years behind the other kids.

Should you be concerned?

Early childhood education (ECE) is not particularly new. Parents have been sending their kids to ECE schools for some 20 years now, and some countries think so highly of it that they fund full-day preschools. Sweden, for one, has a government-supported, municipally operated preschool program for all children. The Swedish government sees its preschool system as the first step in children's long-term education.



Gabi Maresky prepares for a Torah Tots Preschool Shabbat program.

In Canada, school for children at age two or three is not mandatory, although Ontario does regulate preschools through the Day Nurseries Act. In Toronto, there are a lot of programs available for kids from about 2½ to four the traditional age they attend junior kindergarten.

Educators contacted by The CJN, including those who operate preschools and who have an interest in encouraging parents to send their children to one, agree that parents are very anxious about their children's education. At the same time, while they extol the virtues of early childhood education, they also agree that moms and dads are capable of providing, at home, the intellectual encouragement, developmental stimulation and enriched environment that children need to thrive.

But, they add, preschool programs for two- and three-year-olds have the added benefit of providing an enriched educational environment that few households can easily match.

So how necessary are preschools for two- and three-year-olds, and do they provide a long-term educational benefit?

Martha Friendly, senior research associate in the childcare resource and research unit, Centre for Urban and Community Studies at the University of Toronto, said junior kindergarten geared for four-year-olds has been around since the 1950s and has become so widespread that 95 per cent of children attend at that age.

The move to start children's education even earlier has been gaining ground in recent years, whether in full-day or half-day programs, she said.

Educators widely recognize that "ECE is a good thing for children at that age," and parents, particularly those in the middle class, are increasingly eager to enrol their youngsters in ECE programs, Friendly said.

"Probably, it's more common now to go to that kind of program, but it is not a new idea." Three-year-olds attended preschool programs as early as the 1870s, she said.

Researchers in France found that the sooner children started in preschool, the better they did in Grade 1 – at least as measured by the rate at which they were able to continue in Grade 2. Children in France are more likely to be kept back a year than they are here, she said, but the earlier they started a full-day preschool program, the less likely they were to have this happen.

An American study indicated that for low income kids, preschool provided measurable benefits as well. Children did much better in school in subsequent years, Friendly said, adding, however, that the quality of the preschool is an important factor in those results.

Friendly noted that most of the research in this field examined full-day rather than half-day programs.

A good preschool will not be regimented but will have children engaged in what they are doing, playing co-operatively and participating in age-appropriate activities under the supervision of trained teachers. Preschools help children develop their fine and gross motor skills and learn to use language, she said.

"It's really a great thing for children to go to these programs. I think it would be the unusual parent who could provide [a full range of activities]... It is an additional experience [parents] can give their child."

A 2002 report, The Early Years Study Three Years Later, by Margaret McCain and Fraser Mustard, surveyed other studies on ECE and noted that a 1970 British report "found that preschool programs and parenting practices were important predictors of the mobility of children from all social classes." That finding, the researchers noted, was compatible with an American study that showed clearly "the effect of improvement in the early years on better outcomes in school and adult life."

Regina Lulka, principal of the Montessori Jewish Day School, said the ultimate goal at the school, which serves 98 children from age 2½ to 10, is to get "them to love learning."

The school helps its youngest students learn through movement, manipulation of objects and co-operative and social learning, she said.

The youngest children are in the same room with four- and five-year-olds, which allows the older ones to develop leadership practices and create a "respectful, helpful" environment.

The Montessori method, revolutionary when it was introduced some 100 years ago, allows children to learn at their own pace with objects and toys of interest to them, Lulka said. That can be duplicated in a home setting, she acknowledged, but a preschool program gives parents and children a welcome break from each other while permitting children to learn with their peers.

Parents who can't afford preschool fees can duplicate the schools' benefits if they provide their children with a stimulating and enriched learning environment, she added.

Goldie Plotkin, director of Torah Tots Nursery School, a preschool with 140 children from 2½ to five years old, said some youngsters benefit more from being at home with their parents.

Regardless of whether they are in school or at home, children must feel loved and secure for them to learn and develop. Academic expertise delivered in a preschool is important, "but it can't take the place of the love and nurturing and warmth of a mother and father," she said.

A preschool can supplement that environment, and she advises parents who are searching for a preschool to look beyond its physical facilities and examine the school's environment.

Children age two and up are developing rapidly, but they need to feel confident, secure and loved to benefit from preschool, she said.

If those criteria are met, then the facilities available at quality preschools can make a difference – whether it's a sand table, a water table or a sensorial activity (where kids feel objects like pasta and "goop"). Activities like finger painting, cooking, baking, music and art help children learn as well, she said.

Plotkin believes "preschool children need to spend lots of time at home" and a preschool should serve as an extension of the development they enjoy there.

No set Holocaust curriculum in public schools

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

For many years, Faigie Libman, 71, one of the youngest Holocaust survivors from Kaunas, Lithuania, spoke little about her experiences.

Now, she says, she doesn't stop.

As a youngster, she lived in the Kaunas ghetto with her parents and grandparents, and spent time in Stutthof concentration camp, as well as four labour camps.

"I never talked about my life until I retired from Associated Hebrew Schools, where I taught junior kindergarten for 26 years.

"I was heartbroken to leave the classroom, and since then, I've talked constantly."

Hundreds of students have heard her speak. Her speaking engagements are arranged through the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and a public school in Brampton once gave her a $1,000 cheque to donate to the centre, she says.

"One Catholic school sent me a letter thanking me 'for sharing and touching their hearts,' and at Humberside Collegiate I got a standing ovation.

"A student came up to me with tears in her eyes and told me that her grandfather came from Lithuania. When she asked him why he didn't help the Jews, he told her he wasn't allowed. I told this girl that she could be a leader now and prevent such a thing from happening again. I said she should always remember me, and tell her children and grandchildren."

Libman has spoken to church groups and to students from Grade 4 to university. "Wherever I'm asked to go, I go."

She made the decision to start talking, she says, "because I have to make sure [these students] know what hatred and prejudice can do. The students are our future."

In her presentation, she says, she talks about the Righteous Gentiles so all "students see that they can do something.

"I also show them a newspaper article about [the war criminal] Helmut Rauca. I actually saw him at the Kaunas ghetto in 1941. When he was arrested in 1982, I relived everything. I was so devastated that I locked myself in my room [for days].

"I never know who I'm going to touch. The truth is that the night before I speak, I can't sleep. I never know how the kids will react, but when I finish talking and begin taking questions, I realize that I've done something special."

Roz Lofsky, who teaches English as a second language at A.Y. Jackson Secondary School, said she taught an extensive unit on the Holocaust when students still attended OAC.

"About 20 years ago, there was a real push to teach the Holocaust. [Former] superintendent Morry Patt had a huge interest in it. A curriculum was written, money was given for professional development, and schools were encouraged to teach it."

Then the curriculum changed, Lofsky says. "Somehow the thrust to teach the Holocaust stopped and teachers had to fit it in when they could. There is no encouragement now.

"Students spend a day or two on it in Grade 10 history, but it's offered nowhere else unless the teacher decides."

It is "essential" for students to learn about the Holocaust, she says, "because they must learn how low humans can go. They have to be vigilant. It's important for them not to be passive bystanders. A lot of people just let the Holocaust happen, and that is an important message. They must take a stand."

Currently, she says, there is no Holocaust curriculum in public schools. "Things might be looking up, however," she adds. Last year, the UJA Federation's Holocaust education committee, of which Lofsky is a member, "offered a teachers' seminar but had to cancel because too few people signed up. This year, we offered it again and 75 teachers enrolled."

Lesley Shore, an assistant professor at University of Toronto's Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE), has a special interest in Holocaust education, and teaches a course called Anne Frank and the Writing of the Adolescent Self.

"Schools are not compelled to teach about the Holocaust, but the Ontario curriculum does leave the possibility open.

"With an absence of curriculum, however, the teachers seem to do nothing about it. My experience tells me that [many teachers] tend to stay away from a difficult topic.

"There are teachers, though that do teach it, and amazingly they're not all Jewish. They feel a moral obligation to carry it forward."

Shore mounted an exhibit on Anne Frank in OISE's library last year, and took the dean of her school to see Paper Clips, the movie about students from Whitwell, Tenn., who collected six million paper clips representing the six million Jews killed by the Nazis.

She insists that students from Grade 5 and up should be learning about the Holocaust. "But teachers need to be trained. I'm doing all I can, but I feel like I'm holding up the sky."

Students research individual Holocaust victims

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Grade 5 students at Leo Baeck Hebrew Day School recently learned about the Holocaust in a very personal way.

Their language arts teacher, Danielle Ryval, provided them with biography cards from the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., and each student researched the life of the person on his or her card.

"These cards were about survivors, victims, freedom fighters or Righteous Gentiles. Students took what information they had on their cards and continued their research in books.

"My objective was to have the students personalize the stories. Six million is an overwhelming number, but by following the story of one person, it becomes more authentic to them," Ryval says.

Students were instructed to find out about the person's hometown and about the Jewish community before the war, she says.

"The students really got into this project. Some had a little knowledge about the Holocaust, and some have grandparents connected to the Holocaust, and were ready to explore the topic further.

"[These cards] provided a foundation for the kids to begin learning about their history. It opened their minds and hearts, and helped them appreciate their grandparents' history. It is a huge concept and we have to start teaching it slowly."

She also had her students write an oath, she says, about not forgetting the past. "I'm trying to teach kids to be better people. I want them to know that they can make a difference to other people's plight."

School says it's making great strides to provide more choices

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

If it seems like every other Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto graduate becomes either a doctor, lawyer or businessperson, it may not be a coincidence.

Elysse Zarek, a 2001 CHAT graduate who has a bachelor of journalism degree from Ryerson University, and Mitchell Marcus, a theatre actor and producer with his own theatre company who graduated from CHAT six years ago, believe that many of their peers ended up in more conventional professions partly because of the limited information and choices provided to them by CHAT's guidance department.

When it came time to decide which university and what program Zarek should apply for, CHAT's guidance counsellors didn't seem to know much about schools other than the University of Toronto and York University, she said.

She recalled that when she inquired about Ryerson and its renowned journalism program, her guidance counsellors seemed uninformed about it, and she felt discouraged from applying there because Ryerson didn't have a large number of Jewish students.

"I was really persistent about getting the information. I had to make it clear to them that I was serious about it," Zarek said, adding that only after she insisted on getting it did she receive help in pursuing that path.

"In retrospect, it would have been nice if they knew more about other schools and gave me more options," she said.

Marcus also said that students tended to be directed into conventional professions by default – "specifically in terms of the options [guidance counsellors] give."

He said that as a student who was very involved in acting and theatre, when it came time to decide what program or school would be the best fit for him, he was left uninformed about his choices.

"When I left CHAT, I didn't know what 'arts' was at university. I thought it was a major in itself, which it's not."

He said he was completely unaware that there were many majors to choose from in the arts and fine arts streams, and that the two are different.

But Margaret Klompas, head of CHAT's guidance department, said that every year the school organizes a career day for Grade 11 students, with nine or 10 different panels in which professionals from many different fields speak about what they do and what a typical day is like for them.

Klompas said the focus used to be more on business, law and medicine, but it was changed because the guidance department felt it was important to expose students to a wider variety of careers.

"We try to give them a view of what's out there," Klompas said.

"If you think of who we're inviting [to career day] – a chef, a musician, a social worker, a publisher, an engineer… – we're not speaking with just the conventional professionals."

Marcus, who has spoken at CHAT's career day in the "arts" room, feels that having only one room for both "arts" and "fine arts" – which together offer more majors than any other single faculty at most universities – is not enough.

Mitchell Marcus

"There shouldn't be one room of arts [and] two of medicine… That is so disproportionate to what universities offer. It should be six rooms of arts that are grouped together in interesting ways," Marcus said.

"One thing that is lacking is that when it comes to filling out those applications, I do think that there is a bit of information missing about what the options are, that there are schools that exist outside of [the University of Western Ontario], York, U of T and McGill [University]."

Marcus said that although performance and theatre had always been a big part of his life, when it came time to make his important choice, he knew he didn't want to go into a theatre program.

He ended up at York's Schulich School of Business, but dropped out after his first year. He later graduated from York with a degree in fine arts and cultural studies.

He said that if he had been aware of all his options and had been told about programs such as theatre management, he may not have wasted a year in business school.

"This is why I like to go back [to CHAT] and lecture on career day," Marcus said. "If you don't want to get a business degree… there are a million different options."

Although Marcus is critical of CHAT's guidance department, he is confident that counsellors are not intentionally steering students to become doctors, lawyers and businesspeople.

"No one ever said to me, 'You shouldn't do theatre, look at this medicine program,'" he said.

"I don't think they're trying to foster a community of businessmen."

However, Marcus does feel that not enough is being done to guide students who don't have a clear idea of what they want to do after high school.

"Too many of my friends ended up arbitrarily in political science or in one of the programs you take because you don't know what you want to do.

"If they had maybe really sat down and thought about it, and had somebody to work through it with them to say, 'What are your interests, let's look at things that might interest you,' they might not have just gone to Western arbitrarily."

Students consider pros and cons of out-of-town university

By KYLE GORDON
Special to The CJN

For many high school students, attending university is the next logical step in education, but deciding on the university that will best suit their specific needs can be a daunting and challenging task.

Sari Shawn, 18, was confronted with the decision of where to attend university just last year. Then a Grade 12 student at York Mills Collegiate Institute, in Toronto, Shawn knew that she wanted to go away to university, but she wasn't sure where.

"Staying at home was never something I thought of. I wanted to become more self-sufficient and independent," Shawn said about her decision to attend an out-of-town university.

Shawn's parents outlined a few stipulations before their daughter committed to a university.

"My parents said as long as I was in a good program they would support me wherever I went," she said. They also wanted her to understand that if she decided to attend a university that required a plane ticket, like the popular Dalhousie University in Halifax, she would be limited on how often she could come home during the year.

"Finances were an issue. If I went to Dalhousie, I would only be able to come home once during the year and I wouldn't have had my parents to help me move in," Shawn said.

She began to consider universities that were far enough away from Toronto to give her the independence she required, yet close enough to come home when she needed some family time.

In the end, Shawn decided to follow in the footsteps of her older sisters and attend university in London, Ont. She is currently in first year at Huron University College, the founding college of the University of Western Ontario.

Shawn is pleased with her decision and still believes that going out of town for university is a valuable experience.

"When you go away and you're on your own, there is no one to motivate you except yourself. People can either become lazy, or gain a lot of responsibility and understand that if you don't push yourself, no one will in the real world. If you stay at home, it is so much easier to get your parents to help you with everything," she said.

Zoey Fiksel, a graduate from the University of Toronto, admits that by attending a local university she may not have received some of the life skills that her friends acquired by going away to school, like paying bills and living alone.

She is pleased with her decision to stay in Toronto and proud of the reputable university where she received her bachelor of arts degree, but she would still encourage students to try and go out of town for university. "You can always go away and come back if it's not right for you. I know lots of people who have done that. Try it – what's the worst thing? You can always transfer if it is not for you," she said.

Sari Shawn prepares for exams at University of Western Ontario Huron University College's library. [Halee Donenfeld photo]

Fiksel lived at home for the four years she attended U of T, and while her parents were understanding about her comings and goings and her house was very conducive to schoolwork, she feels she missed out on some of the social aspects of university by not living in residence first year.

"I would suggest res. It is a great way to meet people, and it is a good taste of living away while still living in the city," she said.

Debbie Chadwick, the academic advisor at Huron University College, believes that residency is a good first step toward independence for students leaving home for the first time. Typically, if students are confident in their independence, they will have a smooth transition from high school to university, she said.

"I think the students that have the easiest time are the ones who have gone away for a month or two in the summer and have experienced some separation from their parents," she said.

Residency is a big part of the first year experience. Students who live in residence make a connection with their classmates that off-campus students do not have, added Sharon Robertson, director of student services at Huron University College.

"It is much harder for off-campus students to be part of the experience. In residence, the students study together, eat together and party together. I encourage local students, if they can afford it, to consider living in residence," she said.

In the end, choosing a university is about making the best decision for the student. "Go where you feel you are going to get the education you want and where you feel the best about the programs offered," Robertson added.

But before making any decision, Robertson encourages all students to do their research. Go to the university fairs, ask around and get a feel for how the university presents itself.

THE VALUES OF LIVING JEWISHLY

A Year of Living Jewishly!

BEYOND
A Year of Living Jewishly

Adventure Judaism begins with our values-based curriculum focussing on promoting interest and enthusiasm for all things Jewish. One day a week, Sundays or Tuesdays, grades 1 through 6.

Adventure Judaism continues with an interactive, hands-on approach to education for B'nai Mitzvah students (usually Grade 7) featuring a comfortable mix of field trips and in-class seminars. Every other Sunday for three hours.

The third part of Adventure Judaism reinforces the lessons from Hebrews'Cool and A Year of Living Jewishly with a three-year cycle that mixes educational and social elements. For students in grades 8 through 10. One Thursday each month for four hours.

FIDDLER ON CHAT'S ROOF

She's off to a great beginning. We're helping to make sure it won't end.
Jewish education has always been the backbone of Jewish life.
That's why UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education – with an eye to the future – is investing over $11 million in formal and informal Jewish education – more than any other North American Federation.
Just like our children, we're looking to the future.
The future of Jewish life.

Making Israel 'come alive'

Special occasions are the best time to feel Israel. "In some ways [holidays are] more intense than… in Israel," Rabbi Diamond says. "We bring part of the Israeli experience to our students." A full-day Yom Ha'atzmaut program, for example, "creates a wonderful flavour of Israel."

The school also often welcomes Israelis with important messages for kids. Capt. Omer Teori, an Israel Defence Forces combat fighter, recently spoke about his experiences as a religious soldier.

"It's having an impact," Rabbi Diamond says. "I think we're really successful. A tremendous amount of kids… go on to spend at least a year in Israel." Many graduates have made aliyah or voluntarily served in the IDF. "Following disengagement, one of our graduates who lived in Gush Katif came to talk to the kids. Graduates have also come to talk about their experiences in the army."

At Bialik, Israel is also about much more than just good grades. Students spend six months preparing for a school-wide Chidon Israel (Israel I Love) competition in which they show off knowledge of every aspect of Israeli life: geography, history, literature, politics. "They know the parties, the ideology… it's important to see Israel as it is today," Dayan says.

The school even boasts a "little piece of Israel" in the five-year-old Israel Interactive Centre (IIC), a classroom, museum and workshop in one, run by Nurith Sela, whose love of the land inspires a range of activities.

There, Grade 4 students build on mapping skills from general studies, creating tactile relief maps of Israel. At this stage, Sela says, "they don't know the [place] names, but they know the shape." Hands-on learning makes Israel "come alive."

Kids even get their hands dirty – using actual rocks and soil from the Negev to create animated movies. Through interdisciplinary problem-solving, they tackle Israel's most pressing issues, such as water shortages. They also create models of familiar Israeli landmarks, which are proudly displayed around the IIC.

Sela says even today's kids still arrive with misconceptions: "They think Israel is tents and camels." Through interactive learning and video-conferencing – joining Israeli kids for a Tu b'Shvat celebration Israel "becomes real," she adds.

Dayan says she'd like to make IIC resources available to the broader community.

A focus on Israel is evident in student work at Bialik Hebrew Day School.

DINING OUT ON ISRAEL

The Jewish Law Students' Association at York University's Osgoode Hall Law School held Osgoode's first-ever Israeli Dinner last month. The event included live Israeli music, entertainment and food representing Israel's culture, history and diversity. About 80 law students – both Jewish and non-Jewish – gathered in the school's junior common room to enjoy staples of Israeli cuisine such as bourekas, falafel and olives from the Galilee. Tickets were $5 for students, with all the proceeds donated to Ve'ahavta.

UWO students launch Human Rights Review

By KYLE GORDON
Special to The CJN

A lack of awareness surrounding global human rights issues led two University of Western Ontario students to create the Human Rights Review.

Ariella Goodman, 22, and Tamara Morgenthau, 21, met four years ago while in their first year at UWO. But it was not until September 2005, while attending Shabbat dinner at London's Chabad House, that they discovered a common passion for raising awareness about human rights violations.

"We thought that most of the student population would be interested in this issue, but many of them don't have the time or are not willing to make the effort to research it themselves. We thought by providing them with a publication dedicated to global human rights issues it would increase awareness and generated discussion," Morgenthau said.

University of Western Ontario students Tamara Morgenthau, left, and Ariella Goodman are the editors of the Human Rights Review. [Kyle Gordon photo]

Following the Crisis in Darfur conference at UWO in October, Goodman and Morgenthau decided to take their concern for human rights issues to the next level.

They started sending e-mails to classmates, friends and professors requesting writers for the first publication. Students Taking Action Now Darfur (STAND) also played a prominent role in spreading the word.

"The response has been really positive. We have had a lot of people contacting us who want to get involved," Goodman said.

"It just grew from there."

In February, Goodman and Morgenthau launched the Human Rights Review (HRR). Originally, the review was to be released before the December break, but they decided to wait until February so the launch would coincide with the Amnesty International event Keeping the Lights on Human Rights. The event featured a panel of guest speakers who discussed the topics of poverty, racism, women's rights, refugees and genocide.

It seemed fitting that the first issue of the HRR, which focused on genocide and the current situation in Darfur, Sudan, would be launched around the time of the Amnesty event, said Morgenthau.

"Darfur is a really prominent issue right now. We thought we should make the first issue on genocide because a huge theme with genocide is the lack of awareness," she said.

Goodman added that "the United States has already declared that the situation in Darfur is a genocide, but they refuse to act. We want to gain public awareness and get people involved. If we get involved, maybe the United States will do something."

Following the success of the genocide edition, Morgenthau and Goodman have started planning for the second and third issues. The next two issues will focus on the themes of poverty and justice respectively.

"With each edition we are trying to spread awareness and show that everyone can make a difference and everyone can help," said Morgenthau.

Goodman added: "We are just showing them how."

In addition to providing an overview of the situation in Darfur, the review also includes addresses of websites with more information and ways to get involved with STAND Canada.

"It is important that students have the tools. We are the people who will make a difference eventually," Goodman said.

Although Morgenthau and Goodman are graduating this spring, they have no intention of abandoning the publication.

"We hope to keep it going even when we are gone. We want to expand it to different campuses and get writers from all over Canada involved," Goodman said.

Hamantaschen recipes are really kid friendly

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Hamantaschen are the food most commonly associated with Purim. Traditional hamantaschen are made with a pareve or butter cookie dough, although yeast dough is also popular.

While poppy seeds and prunes are the classic fillings of choice, many people use jam, and there are other sweet and savoury fillings used by cooks looking for something just a little different to serve to family and friends at the Purim seudah (dinner) or to put in the mishloach manot basket.

The following recipes are all kid-friendly (both to make and to eat) and offer a mix of unusual and delicious ingredients. Most of these recipes can be made ahead of time and frozen.

CHOCOLATE RASPBERRY HAMANTASCHEN

½ cup margarine
¼ cup sugar
1 egg
1½ tsp. vanilla
1½ cups flour
½ cup Dutch process cocoa
½ tsp. baking powder
½ tsp. baking soda
¼ tsp. salt
1 jar raspberry preserves

In a bowl of an electric mixer, combine margarine, sugar, egg and vanilla and blend until well mixed.

In a separate bowl, combine the cocoa, flour, baking powder, baking soda and salt. Add the dry mix to mixer bowl and blend together until well mixed. Divide dough into four pieces and chill for one hour.

When chilled, preheat oven to 350. Roll dough out on a lightly-floured surface to about ⅛-inch thickness. Cut into 3-inch rounds. Re-roll scraps. Place 1 teaspoon raspberry preserves in centre of round and fold three sides up to form a triangle, leaving some preserves visible in the centre. Pinch the corners and place on greased cookie sheet, two inches apart (hamantaschen will expand). Bake for 15 minutes. Cool on a wire rack. Makes 2 dozen.

FIG HAMANTASCHEN

¼ cup sugar
2 cups all-purpose flour
2 tsp. baking powder
1¼ tsp. salt
8 tbsp. unsalted butter or margarine, cut into small pieces
1 egg, lightly beaten
3 tbsp. fresh orange juice
¼ lb. dried figs, chopped
1½ cup water
1 tsp. fresh lemon juice

In a food processor, combine the sugar, flour, baking powder and salt. Pulse once or twice to combine. Add the butter or margarine and pulse until the mixture resembles cornmeal. Add the egg and orange juice and process just until dough forms. Remove the dough and wrap it in plastic wrap. Refrigerate for 2 hours or overnight.

Combine the figs, water and lemon juice in a saucepan and cook over medium heat until most of the liquid evaporates, about 10 minutes. Let cool and puree in a food processor.

Preheat the oven to 400. Line cookie sheets with parchment paper or grease them. On a floured surface, roll out dough ⅛-inch thick. Cut into circles with a 3-inch cookie cutter. Place 1 teaspoon filling in centre of each circle. Pinch 3 edges of dough together, leaving a small opening in centre for filling to peek through. Place on prepared cookie sheets and bake until golden brown, about 20 minutes. Let cool on rack 10 minutes before removing. Makes about 24.

KATI'S APRICOT PRUNE HAMANTASCHEN

Dough:
2 cups sifted all-purpose flour
2 tsp. baking powder
¼ tsp. salt
¼ cup granulated sugar
½ cup cold butter or margarine, cut into ½-inch cubes
1 large egg, lightly beaten
grated zest of 1 orange
1½ tbsp. fresh orange juice

Filling:
2 cups unsweetened dried pitted prunes
1 cup unsweetened dried apricots
1 cup water
1 tbsp. lemon juice
½ cup honey
¼ cup walnuts, coarsely chopped

In a large mixing bowl, sift together flour, baking powder, salt and sugar. With a pastry blender or two knives, cut the butter into the flour until the mixture resembles coarse meal. Stir in the egg, orange zest and juice, mixing well until the dough is smooth. Shape dough into a flat disk, wrap in plastic wrap, and refrigerate until firm.

To make the filling, chop the prunes and apricots into small pieces. Put them in a saucepan with the water and bring to a boil. Cover, reduce heat and simmer for about 12 minutes or until very soft. Add lemon juice and honey, then cook, stirring constantly, for about 5 minutes. Stir in nuts and set aside to cool.

Preheat oven to 400 and line baking sheets with parchment paper or non-stick baking mats. On a floured surface roll out dough to ⅛-inch thickness, then cut into 3-inch circles. Place a rounded teaspoon of filling in the centre of each circle and fold up three sides to make a triangular shape with a large opening in the centre. Pinch together the edges of the circle that are touching so that the triangle holds its shape. Bake 12 to 15 minutes or until lightly golden. Allow to cool thoroughly on wire racks.

CREAM CHEESE HAMANTASCHEN

This recipe asks you to use squares to make the triangle shape. Unusual, yes, but they taste just as delicious as using the traditional circle to make hamantaschen.

2 cups flour, sifted
1 cup butter
½ lb. cream cheese
½ cup poppy seeds
1 cup walnuts (chopped fine)
1 cup raisins (chopped fine)
approx. 8 oz. honey

In the bowl of an electric mixer, combine the butter and cream cheese. Mix until well blended. Gradually add in the flour, mixing to make a ball of dough. Place the dough in a glass bowl, cover with plastic wrap and refrigerate overnight. In a bowl, combine the poppy seeds, walnuts, raisins and honey. It may take a little more or a little less than about 8 oz. of honey. Use enough to hold the mixture together.

Preheat oven to 350 and grease the cookie sheets. Roll out the dough (not too thin) and cut into 3-inch squares. Fill each square with about 1 tablespoon of filling and fold the dough in half to make a triangle. Bake on prepared cookie sheets until golden brown, about 20 minutes. Makes about 2 dozen.

Shiite group causing concern in West Bank and Gaza

By KHALED ABU TOAMEH
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority (PA) security forces are investigating whether Iran, Hezbollah or Al Qaeda is behind a new Shiite group that has been operating in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip over the past few days.

Called the Higher Shiite Council, the group is headed by Muhammad Ghawanmeh, a former Islamic Jihad official from the West Bank. Ghawanmeh was close to Islamic Jihad secretary-general Fathi Shikaki, who was reportedly assassinated in Malta in 1996 by Mossad agents.

Hamas officials, upon learning of the new Shiite group, expressed deep concern and called for an investigation to establish who is behind the initiative.

PA and Hamas officials told The Jerusalem Post that either Iran or Hezbollah was most likely behind the group. "The timing of the establishment of the new group is very suspicious," said a top Hamas official. "It appears that some parties are trying to replace Hamas or compete with it."

A PA security official said he did not understand how a Shiite group could operate in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip "where we don't have even one Shiite." All the Muslims living in the PA-controlled areas are Sunnis.

Many Palestinians expressed fear on Sunday that the presence of a Shiite group in the West Bank and Gaza could lead to a situation like the one in Iraq, where Shiites and Sunnis appear to be on the verge of civil war.

The security official said both Iran and Hezbollah are now trying to establish new contacts in the Palestinian territories because Hamas is preoccupied with running the affairs of the Palestinians after its victory in the Jan. 25 parliamentary election. Their fear, he added, is that Hamas would be forced, under international pressure, to halt its terrorist attacks after taking control of the Palestinian Authority.

Leaflets distributed by Hamas and Fatah militias on Sunday indicated that they would thwart the attempt by a Shiite group to establish power bases in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

"We already have too many groups and militias in Palestine," said one leaflet. "There's no room for another one, especially a Shiite council."

A Hamas official in Gaza City said the reports about the presence of a Shiite group are "very disturbing and could have catastrophic repercussions for the Palestinians."

Ghawanmeh, a Sunni, said he became a believer in the Shiite sect after spending some 20 years in an Israeli prison with Lebanese Shiite prisoners. He claimed that his council had many followers in the West Bank and Gaza Strip and that they had all abandoned the Sunni sect.

Ghawanmeh said the new group would work to enhance relations with Iran, Hezbollah and the Shiites in Iraq. "Our objective is to unite the Muslim world," he added. "Our Shiite brothers in Egypt have already established their own group there and we are all working together."

In response to a question about the timing of the establishment of the new Shiite council, Ghawanmeh denied that his group was planning to challenge Hamas. He said the timing was related to growing threats against Iran and Hezbollah by the United States and Israel.

He admitted that his group was in touch with Iran, but denied receiving financial aid from the Tehran government.

He also admitted that his group was linked to "Shiite elements" in Lebanon, but did not mention Hezbollah by name.

Some PA officials said they did not rule out the possibility that the new group was linked to al-Qaeda, but Ghawanmeh has sought to distance himself from the Osama bin Laden and his followers.

"I disagree with Al Qaeda on many issues," he said. "I'm opposed to the killing of innocent people and the destruction of mosques in Iraq." He said his immediate plan was to build a Shiite mosque in Ramallah.

Hamas rises as Kadima falls

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

Analysis

After a successful visit to Moscow, Hamas leaders claim "the wall" of diplomatic isolation Israel is trying to build around the newly empowered organization is collapsing.

But Israel is still confident that the international community will cut off funds to a Hamas-led Palestinian Authority and back Israeli moves for a second unilateral pullback from Palestinian territory.

The Moscow trip perfectly served Hamas' strategy: to gain as much international recognition as possible without making concessions to Israel.

Following talks with Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov, Hamas leader Khaled Meshaal declared that the organization did not recognize Israel's right to exist and that the internationally accepted "road map" peace plan was no longer relevant.

If the Russians had hoped to score diplomatic points by persuading Hamas to accept the West's conditions for dialogue – recognition of Israel, acceptance of previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements and repudiation of violence – they failed utterly.

Hamas, however, succeeded in getting a Russian promise to urge the West not to withhold funds earmarked for the Palestinians.

Hamas has had other diplomatic successes. Its leaders have held talks in Turkey and have been invited to South Africa and Venezuela. They also claim some European countries are holding secret contacts with them.

More importantly, European funding for the Palestinians has not yet dried up. The European Union is releasing $143 million (US) in emergency aid to the Palestinians, on the grounds that the Palestinian Authority is on the vérge of economic collapse and that Hamas has not yet formally taken the reins of power.

With an eye to retaining western aid, without which it couldn't function, Hamas has been putting out mixed messages. On the one hand, it says it won't recognize Israel; on the other, that it's ready for a long truce.

In a rare interview with Israel's Ma'ariv newspaper, Alistair Crooke, a former European Union adviser on security who knows the Palestinian scene well, put a positive gloss on Hamas' position. Crooke argues that a real process of change is underway in the organization and that it would be ready to end the conflict if Israel withdraws to the pre-1967 boundaries, known as the Green Line.

He says Hamas wants a mutually agreed, long-term ceasefire so that it can concentrate on Palestinian institution-building in preparation for full statehood alongside Israel.

Crooke, who now runs the London-based Forum for Conflict Resolution, recently met with top Hamas people and clearly was getting a message across for them. But it's not clear whether Hamas is genuinely ready for some sort of accommodation with Israel, or whether Crooke is merely being used as a pawn by Hamas in a game aimed at impressing European and other western donors.

For now, the Israeli government does not believe Hamas is genuine. While the Hamas leaders were in Moscow, Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni was in Europe trying to pre-empt an erosion in the EU's hard line on Hamas.

In talks in Vienna, Paris and London, Livni argued that it's essential that Europe keep up its diplomatic and economic pressure on Hamas. She also maintained that it would be a mistake to try to circumvent Hamas and negotiate with the Palestinian Authority's President Mahmoud Abbas, from the somewhat more moderate Fatah Party, because he's in no position to deliver.

Indeed, Israeli policy is based on pressuring Hamas to moderate its positions and, if that fails, convincing the international community that there is no peace partner on the Palestinian side and that, therefore, Israel has no option but to set its borders unilaterally.

Thus, the main goal of Livni's European trip seemed to be to set the stage for a second unilateral withdrawal from Palestinian territory, if her party, Kadima, wins the March 28 general election.

On Sunday, Kadima announced its plans for a second disengagement. Avi Dichter, former head of Israel's Shin Bet security service, outlined the details: Israel will dismantle isolated West Bank settlements, relocating the settlers in large settlement blocs close to the Green Line, or in Israel proper.

The Israel Defence Forces, however, will remain inside the evacuated territory, the way it has done in the northern West Bank since the evacuation of four settlements there last summer. Dichter calls it "a civilian, but not a military disengagement."

Dichter explained that since there is no Palestinian peace partner, Israel, too, sees the "road map" as a dead letter and that it would negotiate the new boundary lines with the international community, especially the United States, rather than with the Hamas-led Palestinians.

Hanan Krystal, a political analyst for Israel Radio, says that by officially announcing its disengagement plan, Kadima has set the March 28 election agenda.

"The election will now be a referendum on a second disengagement," he declared.

The timing of Kadima's announcement may have been intended to boost the party's electoral prospects. Over the past few weeks, polls have shown Kadima's share of the vote steadily declining.

Pollsters, who initially paid little heed to the loss of a seat or two, now are talking about a trend. Weekend polls show Kadima getting some 37 seats, well below the 43 it had three weeks ago. Most of the gains have been made by the right – which may not be surprising, given Hamas' accession to power, which has allowed the right-wing parties to paint a picture of an Iranian-backed, Al-Qaeda-supported radical state on Israel's doorstep.

The Kadima plan is intended to show that the centrist party has a realistic answer to the threat, and one more likely to bring about stability and calm than anything the right or left can offer.

Israel 'hopeful' IAEA will refer Iran to Security Council

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Israel was hopeful that the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) would on Monday continue what it started last month and formally refer the Iranian nuclear file to the United Nations Security Council for possible sanctions, government officials said Sunday.

The officials said the fact the Iranians had not agreed to a Russian proposal to enrich uranium in Russia increased the chances that action would indeed begin in the Security Council on the Iranian dossier.

Nevertheless, Israeli officials have been very cautious not to expect any dramatic sanctions at the outset that would convince the Iranians it would be more in their interest to stop the development of their nuclear program than to go ahead with it. These officials said referral to the Security Council is the first step down "a very long" corridor to keep Iran from gaining nuclear weapons.

While Israel has been lobbying intensively for years to get the Iranian dossier taken up by the Security Council, there is concern in Jerusalem that too much time has been wasted, and there is now a significant gap between Iran's development and diplomatic efforts to stop it.

Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni discussed the need to send the Iranian file to the UN during talks she had last week in Vienna, Paris and London.

Iran, meanwhile, warned Sunday that it will start large-scale uranium enrichment if it is referred to the UN Security Council. "If Iran's nuclear dossier is referred to the UN Security Council, [large-scale] uranium enrichment will be resumed," Iran's top nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani told reporters in Tehran.

"If they [the United States and its allies] want to use force, we will pursue our own path," he said.

"Research and development won't stop, but we are ready to agree to a timetable on [large-scale uranium] enrichment. This is the final proposal from Iran to find a solution," he said.

Iran only has an experimental research program and it would need months to begin any large-scale enrichment.

Larijani also said Iran would not abandon nuclear research, or back down from pursuing its nuclear program if the it was taken to the Security Council.

"Nuclear research and development is part of Iran's national interests and sovereignty, and it won't give it up," he said.

Iran, Larijani said, had exhausted "all peaceful ways" and said that if there were demands made contrary to the Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty, Iran "will resist." "We are ready to set a timetable for uranium enrichment" if Iran's rights are accepted, he added.

Taking Iran to the UN Security Council, he said, is "not an advantage for us and others. It can also make problems for others. However, it will not cause Iran to give up nuclear research and development. If anybody doubts this, they can test it."

Iran, according to Larijani, "will show appropriate co-operation with the IAEA if Iran's nuclear issue remains within the agency."

Earlier, Foreign Ministry spokesperson Hamid Reza Asefi said Iran could reach a nuclear agreement with Russia or Europe within the next few hours.

Asefi said such a deal would be called off if the IAEA referred the Islamic republic to the Security Council, and added that the Russian proposal to enrich Iranian nuclear fuel needed more discussion.

"Both an agreement, and its absence, is possible. Nothing is definite," he said.

On Thursday, Iran and Russia held talks to establish a joint uranium enrichment venture to ease concerns over its nuclear ambitions. However, further talks on the details did not produce a clear-cut decision, as Iran did not entirely give up plans for domestic enrichment – a key Western demand.

Enrichment is a key process that can determine the direction of a nuclear program. Uranium enriched to a low level produces fuel for a nuclear reactor, while higher enrichment produces the material needed for a warhead.

Asefi also criticized what he described as the double standard in U.S. nuclear policy, citing Washington's recent deal with India as an example, and he added that Washington is systematically trying to portray Tehran in a bad light.

Dubai ports firm enforces boycott of Israel

By MICHAEL FREUND
Jerusalem Post

The parent company of a Dubai-based firm at the centre of a political storm in the United States over the management of American ports participates in the Arab boycott against Israel, the Jerusalem Post has learned.

The firm, Dubai Ports World, is seeking control over six major U.S. ports, including those in New York, Miami, Philadelphia and Baltimore. It is entirely owned by the Government of Dubai via a holding company called the Ports, Customs and Free Zone Corporation (PCZC), which consists of the Dubai Port Authority, the Dubai Customs Department and the Jebel Ali Free Zone Area.

"Yes, of course the boycott is still in place and is still enforced," Muhammad Rashid a-Din, a staff member of the Dubai Customs Department's Office for the Boycott of Israel, told the Post in a telephone interview.

A-Din noted that while the head office for the anti-Israel boycott sits in Damascus, he and his fellow staff members are paid employees of the Dubai Customs Department, which is a division of the PCZC, the same Dubai government-owned entity that runs Dubai Ports World.

The website for Dubai's Jebel Ali Free Zone Area, which is also part of the PCZC, advises importers that they will need to comply with the terms of the boycott.

On the site, there is a list of six documents required to clear an item through the Dubai Customs Department. One of them, a certificate of origin, "is used by customs to confirm the country of origin and needs to be seen by the office which ensures any trade boycotts are enforced."

A-Din confirmed that his office examines certificates of origin as a means of verifying whether a product originated in the Jewish state.

On at least three separate occasions last year, the Post has learned, companies were fined by the U.S. government's Office of Anti-boycott Compliance, an arm of the Commerce Department, on charges connected to boycott-related requests they had received from the Government of Dubai.

U.S. law bars firms from complying with such requests or cooperating with attempts by Arab governments to boycott Israel.

In a related development, Israel's largest shipping company, Zim, endorsed the bid by Dubai Ports World to manage the U.S. ports. Zim skirts the Arab boycott by running ships under other nations' flags.

Israel Briefs

We failed Ethiopians: IDF

The Israel Defence Forces has failed to properly absorb Ethiopian immigrants and has not made the best use of their potential, senior IDF officers admitted. As a result, the officers said, only a handful of non-combat Ethiopian soldiers were accepted into prestigious IDF courses, while most were classified as "low-class" soldiers and given insignificant jobs. "We need to improve the way we recruit Ethiopian soldiers," a senior recruitment officer told Jerusalem Post. "We need to get to know the Ethiopians better and to try and understand their world and background."

Two West Bank shootings

The Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade claimed responsibility for a shooting last week that killed an Israeli man at a gas station near Migdalim in the West Bank, but Israeli police weren't ruling out criminal motives. Hours later, an Israeli was seriously wounded in a shooting near the Palestinian town of Kalkilya. In Gaza, a senior Islamic Jihad member was killed when his car exploded. Israel denied involvement.

Roclet lands near Ashkelon

A Palestinian rocket hit a strategic facility in Ashkelon on Friday. Islamic Jihad claimed responsibility for the attack on the facility, which was not described in detail, in the Israeli city just north of the Gaza Strip. In retaliation, Israeli military attacked Qassam rocket launch sites in the Gaza Strip.

Israeli soccer deal criticized

An Arab country's national airline criticized the decision of a British soccer team it sponsors to promote Israeli tourism. Emirates Airlines, which pays $5.2 million (US) for naming rights to Arsenal's new stadium, and whose logo appears on team jerseys, censured the $600,000 deal, which goes into effect for the 2006-2007 season, with an option to renew for one year. Israel will be promoted in Arsenal's Emirates Stadium in London, on the team's website and in its official magazine, where Israel will be billed as Arsenal's "official and exclusive travel destination." The club said it cleared the deal with UAE officials, but a spokesperson for the national carrier denied this, calling the deal "unfortunate," and adding the company will "do our best to persuade Arsenal not to renew."

Octogenarian donates liver

A deceased 84-year-old woman became the oldest-ever Israeli to donate an organ for transplant after her liver was given to a 59-year-old woman. The donation saved the recipient's life. Until now, the oldest donor was a 75-year-old man. The Rabin Medical Center-Beilinson Campus in Petah Tikva said it will change its previous age limits and be able to expand the number of organ donations because of the surgery.

Israel must hit Iran: MK

"Whether America provides Israel with a security umbrella or not, Israel will have to attack Iran," MK Effi Eitam said. In an interview with Channel 10 TV, he warned that "In the coming year – and no later – Israel will have to take one of the most difficult decisions in its history." The attack will be necessary, said Eitam, "unless an unimaginable miracle happens and the diplomatic initiative will bear fruit."

General cancels UK visit

An Israeli army general cancelled a sabbatical in Britain out of concern he could be prosecuted by pro-Palestinian groups. Brig.-Gen. Aviv Kochavi, an ex-commander of Israeli forces in Gaza, indefinitely postponed his trip last week on the advice of the judge advocate general, security sources said. He was to spend a year studying at a British defence college. Israel has been on high alert for legal risks faced by its top brass in Europe after another ex-Gaza commander, Doron Almog, narrowly escaped arrest and prosecution on "war crimes" charges in London last year.

SCHOOLS SHOW STRONG INTEREST IN STAGE VERSION OF HANA'S SUITCASE

The theatrical version of Hana's Suitcase by Canadian playwright Emil Sher opens this week at the Lorraine Kimsa Theatre for Young People, and sales to school groups have apparently already broken records. LKTYP "has sold out school performances faster than they have in the history of the theatre," according to Margie Wolfe, founder and publisher of Second Story Press, which holds the rights to the bestselling book by Karen Levine upon which the play is based.

Plans are already afoot for the Holocaust-related play to tour Canada starting in the fall, and the United States, beginning in St. Louis, Mo., next January, Wolfe reports. At LKTYP, the play runs March 9 to April 27. 416-862-2222. www.lktyp.ca

Recovery from Brain Damage: Montrealer Paul Nadler was a creative and hip television director with an active social life. But 10 years ago, at the age of 30, he suffered a car accident in Egypt that left him with a traumatic brain injury from which he was not expected to recover.

Next week, CBC Newsworld presents Braindamadj'd... Take II, a documentary about Nadler's gutsy, manic determination to regain his previous life. Co-produced by Jonathan Finkelstein of Apartment 11 Productions, the film premieres Tuesday, March 14, 10 p.m. and 1 a.m., and repeats on March 18 (same times).

Unlocking History: Beethoven's Hair, which airs mid-month on the Bravo channel, traces the unlikely history of a lock of Beethoven's hair cut at the composer's death in 1827 by a German-Jewish boy, Ferdinand Hiller, who kept it as a memento. The lock was reportedly used to save the lives of Jews during the Nazi regime, and was sold at auction in 1994 for about $8,000 (Cdn).

Based on a novel by Russell Martin, the documentary also reveals how modern science and forensics have shed new light on the composer's various health ailments; and former owners of this legendary relic tell how it touched their lives. Bravo TV, March 18, 8:30 p.m. www.beethovenshair.ca

Disabled artist has 'chronic cartooning syndrome'

By SVETLANA BARKAN
Special to The CJN

Sofia Kanibolotskaia is a disabled artist who has overcome many challenges.

She is an energetic woman of 32, a cartoonist and a devoted mother of a daughter who turns one this month.

Kanibolotskaia says she is a "person with a chronic cartooning syndrome." Her vision of life results in humorous cartoons and sketches that bring smiles to the faces of kids and adults alike.

She came to Toronto from Moscow with her parents in 1993. She had completed the first three years of medical school there, played guitar, participated in sports and took ballet lessons.

However, Kanibolotskaia was left almost completely paralyzed after her spinal cord was injured during an operation for a non-malignant spinal cord tumour. After that, a Toronto neurosurgeon, Charles Tator, performed five more surgeries, which gave her the ability to use her hands again.

When she recovered, Kanibolotskaia pursued her education – she is currently studying at Ontario Institute for Studies in Education and plans to become a science teacher. She has also completed a number of commissioned works and her creations have been featured at exhibitions in Toronto.

Kanibolotskaia's work was recently featured in an exhibit mounted by the Abilities Festival, which provides a showcase for artists as well as the opportunity for the artists' families to meet. The festival is an annual event in Toronto, supported by such sponsors as Alliance Atlantis, Royal Bank and the Ontario Trillium Foundation.

For the past three years, Kanibolotskaia has designed T-shirt logos for the Queen's Quay Disabled Sailing Club. She is an active member of the club and has participated in Reach Regatta, an annual competition for disabled sailors.

As an artist, Kanibolotskaia continues to experiment with different media. She recently participated in the making of a promotional video for a rehabilitation organization. The video included her visual art and a musical performance.

When a friend wrote a children's book, she asked Kanibolotskaia to do the illustrations, because "nobody can express their inner child quite like Sofia does!"

Every artist has a unique source of inspiration. Kanibolotskaia literally created her newest source of inspiration on March 27, 2005, when she gave birth to Michelle Nadine. She says she didn't know if she was capable of giving birth. In addition to the regular challenges of motherhood, being a disabled mother has its challenges, says Kanibolotskaia. But "there is nothing more important to me than my family, and being able to contribute this amazing creature to the world makes me feel more empowered than ever," she adds.

Her mother, Julia, quit her job and stayed home for almost three years to help Kanibolotskaia through her pregnancy and later with the baby. Julia and and Kanibolotskaia's father, Mikhail, continue to help her care for her daughter.

She feels blessed to have come to Canada and says Canadian society is one of the few in the world where people with disabilities are valued and respected. They offer a tremendous potential that can be used to benefit today's society in so many ways, she adds.

R&B/gospel release taps into religion and social justice

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

David Wall, a Toronto musician and member of the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, doesn't think singing about Jesus is a big deal.

"What's not to love about Jesus," he says. "He was a Jew and a great rabbi."

The Christian deity came up in conversation after I asked Wall about his song, Get Right with God, a southern gospel track off his latest rhythm-and-blues-infused record, Wonder. It's easy to picture this haunting and heartfelt gospel tune with its repeated chants of "Get right with God" and "Jesus" – sung in church. But, says Wall, the song is less about Christianity and more about what Jesus stands for.

"I like the idea of religion mixed with social justice and a politically oriented agenda," says Wall on the phone from his Toronto home. "I'm tapping into that culture, how Jesus connects with the civil rights movement."

Wall adds that when it comes to singing the gospel, none of his Jewish clientele seem to mind.

"I don't think people really care [about singing about Jesus]. For example, in the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, we sing secular Yiddish songs. There are some mystical songs, but we don't sing Jewish liturgy. I don't think there are any contradictions – I've just always loved gospel."

His new disc, which was released in February, is a marked departure from the Yiddish songs he sings with the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band (FBKB). Some of his fans might be surprised to learn that his roots are in R&B, not Judaism.

"This is actually my musical roots. I didn't really get into Judaism as a religion or a culture until my adult years. I used to listen to Janis Joplin and The Supremes, so R&B has always been there," he says.

> 'Yiddish shouldn't be seen as a museum culture. We need to preserve it'

Wall's R&B pedigree was intensified when he formed the Bourbon Tabernacle Choir, an eight-piece R&B band that included Broken Social Scene's Andrew Workman.

In time, Wall, Bourbon's vocalist, got tired of touring with the group, and concurrently, began thinking about his religious roots.

"One of the main reasons I quit Bourbon was because I felt like I was stealing another people's culture. In retrospect, it was ridiculous and self-indulgent, but I was looking out in the audience and there were a lot of black people. I was doing an imitation of African-American music. That coincided with David Buchbinder [from FBKB] saying he needed a singer."

Joining a klezmer band isn't like forming a rock band. Wall needed to learn Yiddish, and impressing bubbies and zaides is no easy task.

"Elderly Jewish people have a real sense of ownership over the language and it needs to be done right. So it was a real challenge to be able to pronounce everything," he says.

However, he doesn't think the aging crowds have an exclusive right to the language.

"Yiddish shouldn't be seen as a museum culture. We need to preserve it. And I think the Yiddish revival is expanding. Maybe because of historical distance and people hear it and understand that there's really great music and it's a great culture."

To improve his Yiddish, Wall took cantorial music lessons. It's something that not only helped him get in touch with Judaism, but it vastly improved his vocal chords.

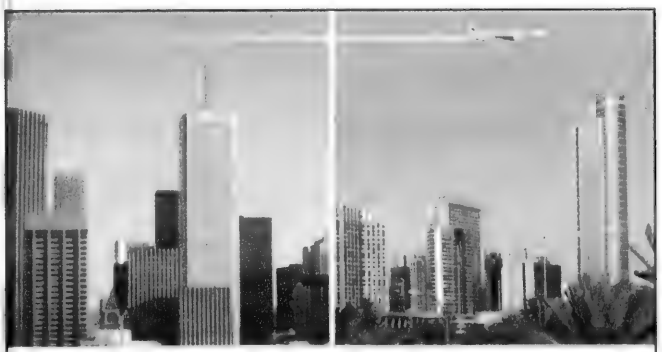
"Stylistically, there's not much of a connection between klezmer and R&B, but in terms of musicality and wisdom, it's [his cantorial training] had a massive influence. It's about proper voice production, not pop inflections. It's about doing a really good job – it's operatic so my voice is much better and much more melodic," he says.

With improved pipes and some distance from Bourbon, Wall was ready to release his first solo album in 12 years. For an active musician, more than a decade between solo records is a long time.

"It was an excuse to hang out with my friends. I have two kids, and I do other projects with people, so that's why this project came to be. I missed my friend [and album producer] Ken Whiteley," says Wall, whose day job involves writing music for film and TV.

Even though Wall's new disc is a throwback to his early influences, he not about to tour the world as he did with Bourbon.

"This is a labour of love and my wife and I are supporting a family. I can't just quit my day job anymore."



Studio 2 host does it all at TVOntario

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

It wasn't until his first week as a student at the University of Toronto that Steve Paikin knew what he wanted to do when he grew up.

The Hamilton native, who hosts two programs on TVOntario – Studio 2, a nightly current affairs show, and Diplomatic Immunity, a weekly foreign affairs show – recalled walking into Hart House on campus and approaching a table set up by the U of T radio station.

"A light just went on and I thought, 'I think this is what I'm supposed to do.' I walked over to the table and I asked them if they had anybody that did the play-by-play for Varsity Blues hockey and football games."

After he was given the green light to call games for the school's varsity hockey and football teams, he said, "Does this mean I get to be the Foster Hewitt of U of T? Foster Hewitt was the voice of the [Toronto Maple] Leafs and he was my idol growing up."

For the next three years, Paikin did play-by-play and Michael Landsberg, currently the host of TSN's Off The Record, was his colour commentator.

"We were perfectly horrible," Paikin said.

Since then, Paikin has been a city hall reporter for CHFI radio, a general assignment reporter, a Queen's Park correspondent, a host of news and current affairs programs on CBC Newsworld and the anchor of CBC at Six in Toronto.

He has been co-host of Studio 2 since its debut in 1994.

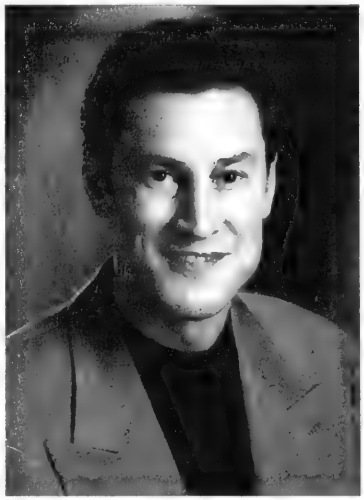
In a career that has spanned more than 20 years, the 45-year-old father of three boys has made a name for himself as a staple of Canadian current affairs programming, and he said he is fulfilling all his ambitions at TVOntario.

"Studio 2 is a beautiful job for somebody who is interested in more than one thing. I love sports and I get to do that every Monday. I love international affairs and I get to do that every Wednesday, Thursday and Friday. I love politics and I get to do that every Thursday, and I love generally what's going on in our world. I love to do documentaries and I get to do one of those a year," Paikin said.



Steve Paikin

In 1993, Paikin produced a documentary called Return to the Warsaw Ghetto, which featured three survivors and their children who revisited the ghetto they were confined to during World War II.

He's also a published author.

"I'm proud of the fact that in the course of a full-time job, I've managed to write three books," Paikin said. "That is just a nightmarish workload. I don't even want to think about how I got it done."

Paikin, who has a bachelor of arts degree from U of T and a master's in broadcast journalism from Boston University, said his biggest challenge was being the moderator of the second English-language political leaders debate in the recent federal election campaign.

"It was the scariest experience of my professional life," he said in all seriousness.

"You are watching the clock to make sure everybody stays on time. You are watching your question sheet to make sure you know where you are on the list. You are listening to their answers so that if there is a logical followup to something they say, you can do that. You have a producer talking in your ear some of the time to remind you of who's next and how you're doing on time and whether you have to do followups or whether you can go on to the next question," Paikin said.

"I found it to be a very challenging experience. The other thing is that Studio 2 is watched by about 100,000 people a night, and this debate is watched by about three million. If you screw up, there are a lot more people who are going to know about it, and you do not want one of your mistakes to adversely affect one of the leaders and possibly affect his performance during the course of the debate."

Although covering politics is one of his passions, Paikin said he would never consider running for office himself.

"The world of politics needs a lot of different kinds of people. It needs people to run, it needs people to govern, it needs people to be in the opposition, it needs people to work on policy, it needs people to run campaigns behind the scenes and it needs people to try to figure out what's going on and explain it to the public. I think I'm best suited to do the last thing."

Paikin said he can only hope that he'll be able to continue informing Ontarians for years to come.

"When I came over to TVO, I thought that if I can do Studio 2 for two years, that'll be just great. I'll learn a lot and it'll help set me up for whatever is to come after that. I just never would have imagined that it would last this long, and I'm thrilled it has and I hope it keeps lasting."

Right now, Adam Rodness is taking part in a yearly acting ritual – pilot season.

Every January to March, thousands of actors pack their bags and head to Los Angeles, hoping to land a spot on a TV show. Rodness, a Toronto actor who hosts Jamie Kennedy's Hip-Hop Comedy Tour, has an advantage over his fellow 22-year-old actors – he's been through pilot season before.

"I spent every penny ever saved in a span of four months," says Rodness laughing. "I went to Vegas and spent tons of money on stupid things, like expensive dinners. I never had a sense of what a dollar meant."

So, Rodness' first visit to Hollywood didn't quite work out as expected, but despite all the spending, he did learn a valuable lesson.

"I thought it would come to me, but when I came back to Toronto I realized that it's not the way it works. You have to go out there and just give."

For the last couple of years, Rodness has been giving his all. Until this past September he hosted a show on the dance music station, BMPTV, and he's currently working on a new music show called Rockstars with Entertainment Tonight Canada's Rick Campanelli.

"We go to every major city and bring bands back to Toronto where we do this whole live rock-show thing," says Rodness. "It's a great idea. It allows Canadian artists to come out and get exposure, and I love rock music."

Rodness isn't sure when, or if, the show will air, but in the meantime he's happy to talk about his role in his first movie, a Jamie Kennedy-produced flick called Kicking It Old School, which is slated for release in 2007.

"Being one of the leads in the movie, trying to carry the movie, you realize you have responsibilities now. It was really cool to see how a whole movie is actually done."

Unfortunately, the experience wasn't all glitz and glamour.

"It was kind of unbearable," he says. "We were filming in the woods and it was just at the peak of when it got hot in the summer. The mosquitoes were hatching and then it started to rain so more mosquitoes came after that."

It's not surprising that Rodness is filming movies, starring in TV shows and cavorting with celebrities (he partied with L.A. Lakers owner, Jerry Buss) – he's been a part of the entertainment industry his whole life.

"My parents are wedding singers," he says, adding that they were also actors when they were younger.

Because of this, Rodness hasn't faced any resistance from his parents in pursuing the bright lights.

"Most parents who have children who want to pursue acting, they turn their heads to it and say you might want to go and do something else. Since my mother was an actor for many years – and my dad pursued it too – they were happy I was going out to do it," he says.

Having supportive parents is important; after all, actors have to be away from home for months at a time if they want to make it in the biz. And they often need to move to a bigger city.

"Making it unfortunately means moving to New York or L.A.," says Rodness. "There's a lot of work in Toronto, but it's all being cast in the States. Sure there are some names out there of people who live in Canada, Colin Mochrie for one, but the big actors are all in the U.S."

While Rodness will take any Hollywood job, he does have his sights set on a specific role.

"I would love to play an undercover cop," he says. "When I was younger, I wanted to be a cop, then I wanted to be an actor, now I want to be an actor playing a cop. Maybe a young 22- to 23-year-old cop who can work with other police officers and undercover."

Forest Hill matron tells her story with surprising candour

Stray Cats & Other Loves* by Evelyn Wolfe, Mosaic Press.

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Born on Toronto's Grace Street in 1927, Evelyn Wolfe became a well-to-do Forest Hill matron, cable-TV talk-show host, Jewish book-club organizer and social convener at the Beth Tzedec congregation. Judging from her recent autobiography Stray Cats & Other Loves, she fulfilled each of these roles energetically and with style.

A born raconteur, the first-time author tells of her various adventures, escapades and intrigues with sure-footed ease and surprising candour.

Her account of her intimate (and innocent) friendship with Irving Layton, whom she revered, should provide fodder for future biographers of the celebrated Montreal poet, who died recently at 93. She also maintained a long-time romantic friendship with Gideon Hausner, the late Israeli legislator who gained renown as Adolf Eichmann's prosecutor at the Nuremberg trials.

The names of other celebrities, both local and international, are sprinkled throughout these pages like so many raisins in a fruitcake. The "dramatis personae" include Aharon Appelfeld, Arthur Cantor, Nathan Cohen, Fania Fenelon, Raul Hilberg, Irving Howe, Werner Klemperer, Victor Kugler, Samuel Pisar, Chaim Potok, Mordecai Richler, Morton Shulman, Elie Wiesel and Herman Wouk. Most come across favourably but a few, especially Shulman, seem to hoist themselves by their own petards.

Wolfe was brave and determined enough to break off wedding plans with an early suitor who was wrong for her, and resourceful enough to build a rich social life through her sometimes difficult married years, befriending the various "stray cats" she found wherever she went.

While she spends relatively few words on her marriage, she gives full airing to various distressing family matters, such as her daughter's recurrent bouts with anorexia and the escalating business and legal troubles of one of her brothers.

Despite her occasional references to herself as a "nervous wreck" who lacked confidence in her younger years, she comes across as warm-hearted, high-spirited and sure of herself, someone toward whom others would naturally gravitate.

Her charm comes through in her description of an early meeting with Layton. Arranging a 1969 speaking engagement for the poet in Toronto, she gave a small party in his honour and later drove him to the synagogue for the speaking engagement.

"By the time we reached Beth Tzedec, I was very comfortable with him, although a little bit in awe of his great intelligence," she writes. "As we waited back stage to begin the program, Irving asked, 'Evelyn, is it all right to use four-letter words in the synagogue?'

"'Absolutely not,' I answered, without flinching, 'but five-letter words are fine, so if you want you can pluralize them.'

"He roared his booming, infectious laugh and hugged me. When something delighted him, his reaction was a sight to behold. At that moment, I felt a bond between us."

Wolfe also became a faithful longtime friend to Stuart Rosenberg, the influential Beth Tzedec rabbi who was summarily dismissed by the congregation, prompting much hard feelings and a bitter lawsuit. Three weeks before the High Holy Days, Wolfe arranged to erect a tent on her lawn for alternative services over which Rosenberg presided.

Another of her lawn parties had a decidedly different tone, and stands out as the book's most madcap and silly moment. Keeping a promise she had made to her daughter, she held a "bark mitzvah" party for the family dog, Toto, to which other dogs and dog owners around the neighbourhood were invited. A newspaper photographer showed up to record Wolfe's zany canine caper for posterity.

In 1950, she and husband Milton Wolfe moved into a Bathurst Street apartment at what is now Markdale Avenue. Her reminiscences are vivid and historic.

"The building was on the west side of the street and at the back was a small garden where we all sat in the summer. Beyond that was nothing but an open field. Today, the area is called Cedarvale, but at that time there were no streets, or houses. To the north of the building, nothing was built except for the Holy Blossom Temple, and from there to Eglinton Avenue, there was nothing to be seen. I felt that we had moved to the outskirts of Toronto."

Despite the presence of numerous annoying typos, which bring credit neither to publication nor publisher, Stray Cats & Other Loves is an impressive, engaging autobiography and a welcome addition to the growing body of literature about the Toronto Jewish community.

Nutritional consultant puts focus on eco-kashrut

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

By observing the laws of eco-kashrut we impact our own health as well as the health of our community and our environment, says Aviva Allen, a registered nutritional consulting practitioner.

Speaking at Torah in Toronto, a series of workshops sponsored by the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Allen said the practice of eco-kashrut helps sanctify consumption so that we can elevate the physical world by acknowledging the holiness of our relationship to God's world.

In observing eco-kashrut, she said, we seek food that is grown organically without pesticides, and avoid food additives, preservatives, colouring agents and artificial flavours. "It teaches us the essentials for healthy living."

The simplest way to describe eco-kashrut, she said, is to take the word "kosher" and expand on it:

K – kinder to animals
O – obedience to God's will
S – self-discipline
H – holiness
E – ethical consumption
R – reverence for life

In expanding our dietary laws, she said, we should add that we should not oppress workers or cause suffering to others or animals.

"Traditional kashrut is concerned with the treatment of animals, but only with regard to slaughtering. Eco-kashrut is concerned with how the animals are treated beforehand.

"Chickens are often raised in horrific conditions. There could be 50,000 broiler chickens cooped up in one barn, and they are given growth-promoting drugs. [Sometimes] they get too big for their limbs to handle and they can't walk."

The chickens that are kept in cages in factory farms have no access to fresh air, she said, and often get angry. To prevent them from pecking each other to death, farmers cut their beaks off.

"Then they are given drugs to treat the stress that is related to being debeaked."

Raising animals to produce veal is a clear violation of ethical behaviour, Allen said.

"In order to make the meat tender and pale in colour, animals are kept in the dark so they are deprived of iron. The question is, 'Can veal ever be kosher?' The answer is 'yes' because the animal is slaughtered properly. According to eco-kashrut, however, the answer is 'no.'

We also have to be mindful of industries that oppress workers and provide poor working conditions, she said. "Dangerous pesticides are often used in growing grapes, and farm workers are exposed to them. They may have agreed to work on the farm, but according to Jewish law, it is still a violation, even if they have given permission."

People must start thinking about ethical consumption, she said, not just about what they eat.

"Eco-kashrut is violated if they waste trees or use things that are not recyclable. They need to be mindful and make the right choices. We can observe traditional laws while addressing the concerns of Jews today."

We can make a difference through individual choices and through market power, she said. "We can buy local organic food, and if we stop buying veal, the stores will stop stocking it.

"Buy free-range organic eggs and chickens. Then you'll know the chickens were raised in a humane way.

"I'm not saying that everyone should be a vegetarian, but try to be a selective meat eater, such as on Shabbat or holidays. Try to think about the total chain of consumption."

Clarification

The article "WISE program gets women back to work" (CJN, March 2) should have indicated that the program was modelled after Women In New Roles (WINR), a JVS employment assistance program for unemployed or underemployed women over the age of 25. This program, located at Finch Avenue and Keele Street has been in existence since 1990.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I am confused about how many servings of carbohydrates I should be getting in a day and what makes up a serving.

A. This is a very good question and you are not alone. Now that the low-carb and no-carb craze has finally run its course, we are all a little confused about how many carbohydrates to eat. I would suggest that adults should consume three to seven servings per day, four to six being ideal for most healthy weight adults. Men should eat at the higher side and women at the lower end of that range.

What constitutes 1 serving of complex carbohydrates (whole grains, the ones you want to be eating most of the time if not always) is the following: ½ cup cooked oatmeal, 1 cup high fibre cereal, ½ cup whole wheat or multigrain pasta, ½ cup brown or converted rice, 1 slice whole wheat, rye or pumpernickel bread, ½ whole wheat pita (6-inch) or one whole wheat English muffin.

Eat these carbs without fear or guilt. They are heart healthy, they will fill you up and keep hunger down and are all generally healthful.

Q. My 11-year-old daughter has always had a problem with constipation and has for years depended on laxatives and suppositories to help her have a bowel movement. I have tried getting her to make dietary changes, but it is difficult and we have had little success. Any suggestions?

A. In my experience, the best natural and healthful laxative is flaxseed. Your daughter needs to have between one teaspoon and one tablespoon per day, and it must be ground or milled (buy it this way). If it's whole, the body can't break down its outer shell. Add this to sundaes, cereal, yogurt, on top of toast, in pancakes, muffins, cookies, banana bread, on salads, in tuna, etc. It has no taste, just a nutty texture, although it is not a nut.

Try this for a week, and I am confident she'll have success. Make sure to use ground or milled flaxseed, not flaxseed oil. Once you open the flaxseed, store it in your freezer for six months or it goes rancid easily.

Katif youth experiencing psychological difficulties

By RAFAEL D. FRANKEL
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — For two weeks after disengagement, Sabir Atias, 17, couldn't get out of bed in the morning. She broke out in skin rashes, cried for days, and fell into a depression no one could help her escape.

"I'm not a person like that," she said recently, recalling her first days in the caravan park in Nitzan. "But there was no solution to my problem. I couldn't see a light."

Six months later, Atias' smile, so conspicuous during her days in Gush Katif, has returned and her speech is as fast and scattered as a normal teenager. She said while she had learned to deal with the bitterness and sadness she felt in the wake of her family's eviction from Neveh Dekalim, she still harboured feelings very different than those she felt before disengagement.

"I'm tougher now than I was before. Things that would have broken me before don't touch me now. But I'm not hopeful for the future, because I think it's all over, and there's nothing to look forward to here."

As disheartening as her comments sound, Atias is among the better adjusted of the youth from Gush Katif, who, six months after disengagement, suffer a wide range of psychological problems, according to social workers and youth- group leaders who work with them on a daily basis.

A majority of the teens have been receiving poor grades and fighting with their parents, and experiencing feelings of betrayal, disillusionment and alienation. Others, social workers said, have contemplated suicide, been victims or perpetrators of rape and incest, exhibited signs of eating disorders, or forsworn school altogether.

"The teens are going through a huge identity crisis," said Haiya Rabinovitch, a social worker from Achiya, in the Binyamin region, who heads 10 social workers hired by the Committee of Gush Katif Settlers to work with the evacuees. "Many of them are dealing with the effects of terror from the last five years, from friends who died, and they have put up a lot of barriers. Now they are in a vacuum where there is no terror, no struggle [against disengagement], and also they don't feel like they have a home," she said.

These feelings have led to a huge number of teens being unable to concentrate in school, she said, while those already in the army or performing national service are constantly moving around and unable to settle down. "It is very tough for the kids to stick to the tasks they are given," Rabinovitch said.

Given the delicate psychological condition of the 1,200 Gush Katif evacuees aged from 12 to 18, a strong, long-term government effort would be required to adequately care for the youth, Rabinovitch said. She, along with other social workers and youth-group leaders, said the government had not come close to fulfilling its obligation to care for the teens.

"The government isn't dealing with the big picture," said Avi Cohen, who works for the Gush Katif committee as an activities counsellor. "They have just acted in small ways, so they can put a check mark on a piece of paper saying they dealt with the problem."

Asked if the government was making the necessary efforts, Social Affairs Ministry spokesperson Nachum Ido acknowledged that his agency had not been fast enough in responding to the needs of the youth, nor to the psychological problems of the evacuees in general.

"We are only starting the major efforts now," Ido said. "It took a lot of time." According to Ido, the government's poor showing stemmed in part from a lack of understanding of how bad the situation was and also from initial denial on the part of the teens and their parents that they suffered psychological problems.

"Nobody knew exactly what would happen. At the beginning, the [evacuees] themselves didn't know what they needed, didn't know they had a crisis. They didn't want to deal with the social workers," Ido said. "Nobody thought that these youngsters, who are very strong and very idealistic, wouldn't go to school, that they would have antagonism toward their parents."

The ministry is only now getting around to spending most of the NIS 10 million (about $2 million US) budgeted for psychological treatment. The ministry will not finish doling it out until the end of April, Ido said.

Now that the full magnitude of the problem is understood, he said, the ministry was gearing up for a stronger effort. Thirty social workers are being hired, and funding has been approved for the construction of three clubs for teens in Nitzan and to pay counsellors to run them. Two social workers are being sent to Yad Binyamin, east of Ashdod, where another trailer park is located, to evaluate the problems of the youth there and develop a plan of action, Ido said.

The government has authorized an additional NIS 10 million to be spent on social services for the evacuees in the coming year, he said.

Rabinovitch said the additional social workers, though welcome, would not be enough. She also said the inexperience of many of the social workers hampered the teen's psychological recovery.

"[A lack of] experience is a very big problem," Ido admitted. However, he said, since social workers are employed by local districts, the ministry could not bring in more veteran staff. "But the social workers who are in charge at the Disengagement Authority are experienced, and they can help the younger ones," he said.

That response did not sit well with Cohen. "People are talking about ending their lives, and you're telling me it's too difficult to get the good people. That's crazy," he said. "These teens are our future and they are wonderful kids.

"It doesn't matter if you were for the expulsion or not. We [hurt] them and now we have to build them up again."

People working with the evacuees fear lasting psychological damage had been done during the past six months, alienating the Gush Katif teens from the country they once loved.

"There was a time I read the paper every day, but now it doesn't matter to me at all," Atias said. "I don't care about the state. I still care about the people, but whatever happens now, it wouldn't matter to me if I lived outside the country. No one is treating us like we deserve. The government, the whole system, the people, they all betrayed us. They didn't care enough."

Athletes inducted into Montreal Jewish Sports Hall of Fame

MONTREAL — Hockey coach Cecil Hart, who guided the Montreal Canadiens to Stanley Cup championships in 1930 and 1931, fitness pioneers Joe and Ben Weider, soccer star Dave Kaplan and the 1949-50 YMHA Blues Canadian senior basketball championship team have been selected for induction into the YM-YWHA Alex Dworkin Montreal Jewish Sports Hall of Fame.

The induction ceremony will take place on May 8. A gala reception for inductees, patrons and gold ticket-holders will precede the ceremony in the Hall of Honour, with proceeds designated for the YM-YWHA youth fitness program, which includes scholarships for needy youth.

Ronald Corey, former president of the Montreal Canadiens, is honorary chair of the event.

The Weider brothers, Kaplan and the surviving members of the basketball team – Irving Kott, Ben Lands, Joey Riehman, Ben Tissenbaum, Sol Tolchinsky, Erie Ulrich, and Murray Waxman – are expected to attend the event.

Hart will be inducted posthumously, as will the deceased members of the basketball team, Doodie Bloomfield, Jack Golfman, Mendy Morein, Johnny Share, Moe Spiegel, and Sam Stein.

Hart, a direct descendent of Aaron Hart, the first Jewish settler in Canada, was born in 1883 and died in 1940. He was an all-around sportsman who pioneered amateur hockey in Canada and moved to professional hockey in 1921, when he helped negotiate the sale of the Montreal Canadiens.

Hart coached the Montreal Maroons in the 1924-25 season but returned to the Habs in 1926 when the team moved to the hallowed Montreal Forum.

In the eight seasons he coached the Canadiens, from 1926 to 1932 and 1936 to 1939, his teams never missed the playoffs, winning Stanley Cups in 1930 and 1931, the first time the Habs won back-to-back titles.

Overall, Hart posted a career NHL coaching record of 196-125-73. Emphasizing speed on the ice, he helped lay the groundwork that made the Canadiens one of sport's most dominant franchises.

Cecil Hart

A tough competitor, he was respected as a true sportsman by players and opponents alike. The Hart Memorial Trophy for the NHL's most valuable player is named after him. The original Hart Trophy, donated to the NHL by his father in 1923, was retired to the Hockey Hall of Fame in 1960 and replaced by the Hart Memorial Trophy.

The Weider brothers, born into a poor Montreal family, decided to get fit at a young age, in order to protect themselves from neighbourhood bullies. From these humble beginnings, Joe and Ben became world leaders in promoting the benefits of exercise and fitness, changing the face of bodybuilding and creating an empire based on fitness publications, bodybuilding equipment and nutritional supplements.

Joe, who was born in 1922, launched the Weider magazine business in Montreal in 1940 and was later joined by his brother, Ben, who was born in 1924. Ben served in the Canadian Army and is now an honorary colonel of the 62nd Field Artillery Regiment of Shawinigan, Que. After Ben's discharge in 1945, the brothers founded Weider Sports Equipment and Weider Health and Fitness, the first step on the road to the development of their multimillion-dollar fitness and bodybuilding business. Their products are sold all over the world.

While involved in all aspects of the business, Ben concentrated on building the International Federation of Body Builders (IFBB), which he founded in 1945. He is still president of the federation, which currently has 173 national affiliates, making it one of the world's largest sporting associations. In 1998, the International Olympic Committee granted provisional recognition to the IFFB, probably the most important of Ben's accomplishments after 52 years of determination and persistence.

Although they are in their 80s, Joe and Ben continue to travel the globe, promoting fitness and strength-conditioning as key factors in the collective health of citizens the world over.

Kaplan, a longtime Montrealer, was an outstanding athlete in soccer, football, hockey, baseball, track and field and tennis, but earned a national reputation as a goalkeeper with the Montreal Hakoah soccer team from 1948 until 1955.

Born in Winnipeg in 1923, Kaplan played football in college and with the Winnipeg Blue Bombers. He also played hockey with several Winnipeg teams, including the RCAF team after he became an airman during the war. With the war over, he moved to Montreal in 1946, playing various sports. He joined the Hakoah Soccer Club on its formation in 1948 and was named its MVP in 1949.

In 1950, he was selected as goalkeeper for the Montreal All Stars in a pair of international soccer games against Manchester United and the national team from England. He was game MVP against Manchester United.

The Y Blues team was a major factor in Canadian basketball for several years. After winning the eastern championship, the 1949-50 team won the national title by beating the University of Manitoba in a best of five series in Montreal.

The Montreal Jewish Sports Hall of Fame is dedicated to Montreal athletes and teams that have recorded outstanding accomplishments, as well as builders and benefactors whose contribution to sports is acknowledged in Canada and internationally.

Winter Maccabee games brings Slovak Jews together

By DINAH A. SPRITZER
JTA

BANKSA BYSTRICA, Slovakia — More than 170 Slovak Jews trudged through deep snow on poorly marked paths in remote central Slovakia recently to compete in the Winter Maccabee games, which marked the 70th anniversary of the last Winter Maccabee games, held before World War II.

Several athletes from the Czech Jewish community also joined, as did an Israeli who resides in Prague.

The last Europe-wide Winter Maccabee games, held in 1936 in Banksa Bystrica, attracted 5,000 participants from around the world. The games were the second-largest sports event in what was then Czechoslovakia.

Following a long hiatus as a result of World War II and then Communism, the Slovak division of the worldwide Jewish sports organization was relaunched 11 years ago with only a handful of enthusiasts.

Gertrude Stiffelova, who watched the 1936 games as an eight-year-old, returned to watch the 2006 competition.

"It's a wonder to be here," she told the crowd at a ceremony following a day of slalom skiing and snowboarding. She received an award just for showing up.

Lucie Belanova, a Jew from Banksa Bystrica who works at a Bratislava bank, said. "I guess, for us," being Jewish "is a social thing."

Belanova believes that no Jew in Banksa Bystrica can read or speak Hebrew.

There are approximately 3,000 Jews in Slovakia today. In contrast to the Czech Republic, where the 1990s were a time of rebirth for Jewish communities, Slovak Jews suffered during the 1990s under Vladimir Meciar, whose supporters included openly anti-Semitic nationalists.

"My children are absolutely free to celebrate their Jewish identity here in a way that I could have never imagined," said Dagmar Gavornikova, chair of the Slovak Maccabee organization. "So many of my generation left in 1968 after the [Soviet] invasion of Czechoslovakia.

"We thought those of us here were the last generation of Slovak Jews," she added. "These games show we were wrong."

Several competitors said they never go to synagogue, but were glad to associate Judaism with something positive like sports, rather than something negative like anti-Semitism.

In contrast to neighbouring Poland, Hungary and the Czech Republic, Slovakia did not undergo full democratization until 10 years after the end of communism in the region. Slovak government officials are now trying to promote religious and ethnic tolerance, but a recent survey indicated that one in three Slovakians would prefer not to live next door to a Jew.

Jana Romanova, 25, a reporter for Slovak television, says she's the only openly Jewish journalist at the station.

"There are a few others there, but they hide it," said the former president of the Slovak Union of Jewish Youth.

Asked to describe her interaction with non-Jews in mostly Catholic Slovakia, she jokes, "When I told someone I was Jewish, she thought we were all dead."

The Jewish take on takeovers

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman C.A.

Acquiring other companies has become a favourite method of corporate growth. With many large corporations awash in cash, and given the slow nature of internal growth, many companies are on the lookout for takeover targets.

The amount of such activity is often a barometer of general economic conditions. It was reported this month that merger-and-acquisition activity in Canada jumped 47 per cent to a near-record $166 billion last year amid "ideal market conditions," according to the investment banking firm Crosbie & Company.

Despite the attendant job cuts that usually follow, there is nothing inherently improper about such activity. The increased efficiencies that are often generated are beneficial to economic growth over the long term, thus making society better off. This is especially true when the targeted firm is inefficient. In such cases, attempts by management to block such takeovers would violate the prohibition of lifnei iver, of giving bad advice to their bosses, namely the shareholders.

Care should be taken to ensure that the individuals affected are treated fairly and equitably as they are forced to find new employment opportunities, but conceptually this is no different than the introduction of new technologies that benefit society while negatively affecting some people. What this means in practice is that, if at all possible, changes should be made gradually so that affected workers have time to train for and secure other employment.

While voluntary takeovers present few ethical issues, hostile takeovers are a different matter. With acquisitive companies often finding few willing partners, pressure tactics may be exerted on unwilling targets. Barrick Gold's successful $10.4-billion (U.S.) bid for Placer Dome is just the latest example.

Jewish law rejects any form of pressure tactics and coercion, whether done personally, through others or even through the media. Even designing scenarios on how to pry an object away from another person is prohibited. It not only violates the prohibitions on jealously (lo tachmod) and desiring (lo titaveh), it's also considered a form of theft. Some authorities maintain that "theft" occurs even if the price paid is above market value. While unethical, such tactics do not label one an evil person whose testimony would not be accepted in a court of law. Presumably, the willingness to pay for the object of desire demonstrates some form of honesty. In addition, continued pressure to sell would violate ona'at devarim, the causing of needless mental anguish to others.

At times, pressure tactics would be forbidden even in the context of a willing buyer and seller. In certain transactions, it's understood that bargaining is part of the sales process, and thus there would be no problem putting in a lower bid than the asking price. However, once an offer is rejected, attempts to try and convince the party to accept the same offer would be unwarranted.

Similar restrictions are placed on sellers. Absent explicit instructions, it would not be unethical for a telemarketer to try and sell you something. If, however, you indicate your desire to be left alone it would be unethical to continue with a sales pitch. As Rabbi Aaron Levine points out in his recent work, Moral Issues of the Marketplace, Jewish law does allow some forms of pressure to induce charitable giving – the "salesman" is facilitating an obligatory act. Nonetheless, such pressure would only be allowed in general terms. Undue pressure for a particular cause is not justified as a donor can rightfully say that while he or she must give charity, they don't have to give to any particular cause.

A place called Shalom

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

I believe our world has been at war since 9/11. The war we are fighting might be a "minor war" if we were to compare it to World War II, however, it is made up of many of the same ugly ingredients as major ones.

Firstly, on this battlefront a very sinister and mad cloud hangs over the world and a deeply embedded hatred lies in the soldiers who direct and fight this war. Myriads of people have died, been maimed and/or have had their lives destroyed because of this hovering black patch of ruin.

Within the war zone, a weapon best described as "sad" has been created – perhaps one of the most unfathomable weapons ever manufactured by human beings – the suicide bomber.

We can shut down chemical weapons and we can dismantle nuclear warheads. But where do we find the "on-off" switch for a living, breathing human being whose sights are squarely set on destroying his or her enemies using his or her skin, skull and skeleton as the trigger and explosive? The development of such a weapon, at its essence, is the contamination of the holy of holies – our bodies and souls created in the image of God. What has crept into the psyches of those who have chosen to use our children as our choice of weapons, when missiles stand taller than skyscrapers?

If indeed we are at war, then let us fight door to door – warriors all of us. But as the bloodied earth of battle lies at our feet, we must also know that at some point the fighting will end, the war will be over and that soaking red wetness will dry.

And when it does, the world will make amends for its lapse in sanity and will be kinder out of a deep existential drive to regain equilibrium between love and hate. Let us therefore begin today in preparation for that moment by setting a table of harmony for every nation, village, rogue and scoundrel so they can lay down their arms and pursue a serious process, with a hallowed intent – world peace.

In order to do this, we, the Jewish people, must remember the words, notes and images we were taught through Holocaust education. As partners in creating world peace, we must recall the stories of the survivors we listened to, recount the words we read in the Holocaust books and listen to the mournful songs sung by choirs, soloists and symphonies recalling the marches and the words of the prayer Shema on the lips of our victims.

We must recall what we learned with great clarity so we can use it to bring peace to our frightened world. Never again!

Peace will come when we finally decide it is welcome; when we can no longer stand the violence and the narcissistic belief one nation is greater than an other. These ideas must be taught to our children, in elementary and high school, and at university. They must be expressed by our rabbis, priests and imams in bellowing voices.

It is within us to find this place called Shalom. So arm yourselves as much as you need to melt down the tyranny of bad men everywhere, but consider, too, that our mightiest weapon, the one that will ultimately conquer the planet, is a heartfelt rocket capped with justice and loaded with understanding and empathy, and has the ability to redecorate our globe with Godliness.

Are you not weary of the murderers, pillagers and pirates; hungry for serenity; starved for it, so much so you will give everything you have for peace – Frieden (German), Nimuhore (Rwandan), Mir (Russian), Shalom (Hebrew)? Are we not tired enough? Are we not awake enough?

Olmert pledges final borders by 2010

Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Israel's permanent borders will be established in the next four years, and at the same time, construction will begin in the controversial E1 section between Ma'aleh Adumim and Jerusalem, acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert told the Jerusalem Post last week.

He also said he has no intention of meeting Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas after the elections.

"The dominant force in the PA is Hamas. Then why [meet]?" he asked. "We do not meet as two graduates from the same high school. There can only be a reason for a meeting if it serves a political purpose. If the government is a Hamas one, what political purpose can it serve?"

Aim is to preserve a large and stable Jewish majority

Olmert said that within the next four years he intends to "get to Israel's permanent borders, whereby we will completely separate from the majority of the Palestinian population and preserve a large and stable Jewish majority in Israel."

This was the first time Olmert has put a time frame on what he has referred to in the past as Israel's most pressing issue – determining its final borders.

He refused to discuss in detail where he envisioned the borders would run, saying only that his broad guidelines included Gush Etzion, the "Jerusalem envelope," Ma'aleh Adumim, the Ariel region and the "Jordan River as a security border."

He pointedly did not sign off on remarks made by Avi Dichter, No. 5 on Kadima's list, who said the settlement blocs that Israel would retain also included the Jordan Valley, Ofra-Beit El, Karnei Shomron-Kedumim and Kiryat Arba-Hebron.

"Dichter is perhaps a candidate to be in the next government, depending on how things develop, but he is not poised to be prime minister," Olmert said.

Olmert's pledge to build E1 within the next four years came six months after he became the first senior Israeli official to publicly confirm

Actress Sharon Stone made her first visit to Israel last week with a schedule that included visits to the Galilee, Negev, Dead Sea, Massada, Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. One of the key purposes of her trip was to support the work of the Peres Center for Peace, whose many projects include programs for the well-being of Israeli and Palestinian children. Stone visited Tel Hashomer Hospital, left, and the Jaffa Tennis Center, right. Stone celebrated her 48th birthday in Israel.

Canada shifts vote on UN resolution

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Only one month into its mandate, the Conservative government of Stephen Harper has shifted from previous Canadian foreign policy, voting against a UN resolution that targeted Israel.

Canada joined the United States late last week as the only two countries to oppose a resolution that called on Israel to allow Palestinian refugee women and children to return to Israeli territory. The vote was 41-2 in favour of the non-binding resolution, passed by the UN Economic and Social Council (UNESC). Last year, Canada abstained on the resolution, but according to a report in the Globe and Mail, Canada's UN delegation was instructed by Ottawa to oppose the censure of Israel this time.

Foreign Affairs Minister Peter MacKay said the vote "was simply a signal that unfortunately after a year, there had been no movement, there had been no progress in a direction that we hoped, and that is one of more balance and a greater reflection of sensitivity to both sides."

He told the Globe the vote was not an indicator of how Canada would vote on future Mideast resolutions.

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) welcomed Canada's vote. Shimon Fogel, CEO of the organization, said, "This government is showing some really meaningful resolve in continuing and expanding on what the previous government had begun to do."

Mostyn to Ottawa

OTTAWA — B'nai Brith Canada has named defeated federal Conservative candidate Michael Mostyn as its new director of government relations. Mostyn, a Toronto lawyer, lost to Liberal Ken Dryden in the 2004 and 2006 elections.

Rabbinic Celebration

NEW YORK — Six Canadians will be among 185 rabbis to formally celebrate their ordination on March 26 at the largest-ever ordination ceremony of Yeshiva University's Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary (REITS). The six are rabbis Barry Kislowicz and Yehuda Sarna of Montreal; Eliav Silverman, Natan Kapustin and Yitchak Motzen of Toronto; and Yonah Levant of Calgary. Founded in 1896, RIETS has graduated more than 2,700 rabbis.

WORLD

Saudis Host Meeting

RIYADH — Saudi Arabia is hosting a conference this week aimed at promoting a boycott of Israel. It comes despite a Saudi pledge to the United States to end its participation in the boycott, the Jerusalem Post reported. The meeting was to be attended by representatives of the 57-member Organization of Islamic States.

Israelis on Ground?

LONDON — Israeli special forces are searching for secret nuclear sites in Iran, Britain's Sunday Times reported. Citing an Israeli intelligence source, the Times said Israel had dispatched commandos to seek out undeclared Iranian uranium enrichment facilities. The secret units reportedly entered Iran through a base in northern Iraq with U.S. approval. Israeli officials denied the report.

Divestment Rejected

LONDON — The Anglican Church's financial advisers recommended against divesting from Caterpillar for doing business with Israel. Its ethical investment advisory group voted unanimously last week against divestment, saying it "could find no compelling evidence that Caterpillar is or has been complicit in human rights abuses." The vote contravenes a Feb. 6 vote by the church's General Synod. Israel uses Caterpillar vehicles when it razes homes in Palestinian areas as part of counterterrorism efforts, and the synod said it would revisit the issue if there are new Caterpillar sales to Israel for use in house razing.

Anti-Zionists in Iran

TEHRAN — A delegation from the Jewish anti-Zionist group Neturei Karta visited Iran last week. It was visiting the Islamic republic to show support for Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and his calls to eliminate Israel, the Jerusalem Post reported. Speaking to Iran's state-run radio, the group called for "the disintegration of the Zionist regime." The small haredi group opposes Israel's existence and regularly sides with anti-Zionist movements.

New Claims Payouts

NEW YORK — The International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims (ICHEIC) is offering $7 million (US) to Holocaust survivors and their heirs. The new money comes from eastern European claims on policies with insurance companies that were liquidated or nationalized after World War II and have no successor firms. The funds are the third set of grants made by ICHEIC and would bring the total distributed to $14.8 million. Established in 1998 to settle unpaid Holocaust-era insurance claims, the ICHEIC has been accused of sloppy management, foot-dragging in claims processing and favouring European insurers.

No Change on Gays

NEW YORK — The Conservative movement's policy on gays will remain unchanged until at least December. During a two-day meeting of the Rabbinical Assembly's committee on Jewish law and standards last week, authors of four responsa on the status of homosexuality in the movement were asked to make revisions in advance of a December vote on the issue. The decision reaffirms the status quo for now, and means the movement's 1992 decision barring openly gay people from its rabbinical schools and forbidding its rabbis to perform same-sex marriages will remain in place.

Sharansky Raps Bush on Democratic Policy

LOS ANGELES — Natan Sharansky said U.S. President George W. Bush's policy of democratization has failed because Bush is rushing tyrannies to elections.

Natan Sharansky

Bush often cites Sharansky, an ex-Israeli cabinet minister and refusenik who has written a book on the issue, in touting democratic reforms in the Arab world.

"Despite what I believe to be the president's genuine commitment to promote sweeping change, the policy shift hasn't matched the rhetoric, with one glaring exception: an intense focus on holding elections everywhere as quickly as possible," Sharansky wrote March 5 in the Los Angeles Times. "This has been a mistake because, although elections are part of the democratic process, they are never a substitute for it."

One result, Sharansky said, was the victory of Hamas, a terrorist group, in Jan. 25 Palestinian Authority legislative elections. Instead of rushing elections, he said, the focus should be on building and protecting a free society.

Insurance restrictions lifted for travellers to Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It appears retail purchasers of life insurance will no longer have to pay a premium if they wish to visit Israel.

Canadian insurance companies are informing brokers that they will no longer require extra payment or write policies with exclusions for those who travel to Israel, said David Brown, a partner with insurer and financial planner Al G. Brown & Associates.

That means most people planning to visit the Jewish state will no longer have to be concerned whether the visit will affect their coverage.

"I think this is a major step forward for people who want to travel to Israel," Brown said.

Since at least 2000 – coinciding with the outbreak of the Palestinian intifadah – insurers have placed limitations on policy holders who are planning to visit Israel. At first, insurers said they would not issue policies for those planning a trip, but after lobbying from brokers and customers, the companies modified their position, agreeing to write policies but only with exclusionary clauses removing their liability if someone died in Israel, or by requiring an additional premium.

Canadian insurers took that course after international re-insurers, which take on the bulk of the risk in many life insurance policies, determined that covering visitors to Israel was too risky, Brown said.

From the outset, Brown contended there was no statistical data to back up that belief. Legislators in the United States seem to have agreed. A number of states, including California, Colorado and Georgia, have laws making it illegal for insurers to deny life insurance to people who travel to Israel. A similar bill is pending in the U.S. Congress.

David Brown

The proposed U.S. legislation, coupled with lawsuits south of the border and the improved security situation in Israel, seems to have convinced the giant European re-insurers to re-evaluate the risk levels of travelling to Israel, Brown said. Travellers to the West Bank and Gaza will still face extra costs or exclusions, he added.

Information Brown has received from Canadian insurers suggest premium-free and condition-free life insurance policies for those who plan to visit Israel will be limited to those whose visit is less than eight weeks and whose policy does not exceed $5 million.

"They should be able to get a standard life insurance contract without a [premium] rating or travel exclusion for Israel," he said.

But Brown suggested that even those travellers who may spend more time in Israel might be able to get life insurance. "I think these are soft guidelines and someone who doesn't fit within the guidelines should still submit their application," he said.

As for those who already own life insurance policies containing exclusion clauses, Brown said there has been no indication yet of a possible transition formula.

Children inspiring children

From the editor's desk

It is hard to believe that it was simply cold, random chance that brought together the lives of a young teacher in Tokyo – Fumiko Ishioka – and a septuagenarian Toronto businessman – George Brady – more than five years ago. Too much dazzling goodness has sparked from the meeting of their deeply humane, steadfast, flint-like natures.

Their story – the poignant circumstances of their meeting and the educational work they have carried on since then - became the powerful, award-winning story called Hana's Suitcase. As most readers of The CJN know, Hana was Brady's younger sister. And the suitcase is the one she carried with her to Auschwitz in 1944 on the last journey of her young life.

Some five years ago, Brady's good friend Marty Goldberg told The CJN about Fumiko's unprecedented work in Tokyo and of her remarkable meeting with George. CJN staff writer Paul Lungen wrote the story. CBC writer/producer Karen Levine read it in The CJN and was so moved that she produced a radio documentary about Fumiko, George and Hana's suitcase that aired on the CBC. Levine was then persuaded to convert the documentary into a children's book that was published by Second Story Press. Hana's Suitcase was the brilliant result.

The story is an astonishingly resonating tale for youngsters that is currently being read and told around the globe in some 30 different languages. It intermingles the details of Hana's life in Europe with the efforts of Ishioka, the director of the Tokyo Holocaust Education Resource Centre, and her eight- to 18-year-old students, appropriately called the Small Wings, more than 50 years after Hana lived, to discover Hana's fate. Those efforts led to their life-altering encounter with Hana's only surviving immediate family member, her older brother, George.

As of last week, thankfully, Hana's Suitcase can also be seen on stage. Renowned Canadian playwright Emil Sher has adapted the book into a compelling play. Directed by Allen MacInnis, Hana's Suitcase is being performed until April 27 in Toronto at the Lorraine Kimsa Theatre for Young People.

It is a moving, emotion-evoking production. MacInnis' direction is tight, well-paced, creatively meshing the children's present search for Hana's ultimate fate with the tragedy of the past they eventually discover.

The sets are a clever aid to the telling of the tale that depict Tokyo, the Bradys' home in Nove Mesto, Czechoslovakia, their prison in Theriesenstadt and their final stop in Auschwitz. Whether as a backdrop for archival film footage or as pieces of torn fragments of a life that slowly find their way together again, the sets combine function with esthetic, stark, minimalist punctuations to the narrative told by the actors.

And the actors execute their roles thoughtfully, sensitively, with striking deference alternatively to the wounding details of Hana's life and the healing, guileless naivetés of the Small Wings.

The performance last Sunday was a special benefit production whose proceeds were dedicated to the Japanese Holocaust Resource Centre and Ishioka's ongoing research and promotion of tolerance around the world. Ishioka and Brady were in attendance and addressed the audience both before and after the production.

Ishioka spoke confidently and forthrightly, praising Brady for his courage and his generosity of soul.

"It's been five years since I came to Canada to meet George. Through learning about the Holocaust, the children in Japan learn about what is important to make the world a better place.

"All the letters, e-mails, poems, projects and songs exchanged among the children have been so inspirational for me. We will share with Japanese children, the e-mails and stories of Canadian children.

"It is a beautiful example of children inspiring children. Hana has given me a great gift."

Brady spoke softly, almost self-consciously, praising Fumiko for her courage and her generosity of soul.

"Fumiko has visited over 200 schools in Japan sharing with children the story of Hana's Suitcase. She is responsible for teaching millions of children about tolerance and respect for each other."

In the play, the character of Fumiko tells her young charges, "When you open hearts, you open minds."

Five years ago, far away in Tokyo, the Small Wings of Fumiko Ishioka sent their message of "wanting to do good in the world" to George Brady in Toronto who, with tears in his disbelieving eyes, joined with them in their cause. Now Small Wings and Survivor together bring that message to millions more "small wings" around the world, in the prayerful hope that their minds and hearts too will be opened to the important story of Hana's Suitcase.

Biggest threat in Israel is 'internal intolerance'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Israel has "come back to life" compared to a few short years ago, says the editor-in-chief of the Jerusalem Post.

Unemployment is down, although there are economic problems, including a fast-growing gap between rich and poor, David Horovitz told members of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's real estate cabinet at the Intercontinental Hotel last week.

David Horovitz

"The situation is improving, but it's fragile," said Horovitz, who edited the Jerusalem Report magazine before moving to the Post.

Also, he noted, disengagement from Gaza is "not over... it left many scars. People are still living in hotels. There are people who haven't been reacquainted with their belongings because they haven't found accommodations." In Nitzan, he said, there is 60 to 80 percent unemployment among people who were all employed in their previous homes.

"There's a tremendous sense of alienation among a large proportion of Orthodox Jews... It's very important that we have elections now."

The biggest threat in Israel, Horovitz believes, is internal intolerance and hostility between Jews themselves. "I encourage you... to help us absorb that rich Diaspora tradition of internal Jewish harmony," he said, alluding particularly to federations where "you take for granted" that Jews from diverse religious backgrounds work together.

Although some people have been predicting a "new intifadah" since Hamas won recent elections in the Palestinian Authority, Horovitz said the old intifadah didn't really end.

"Israel got more effective at fighting terrorism... We started building the security barrier, and making arrests on a much larger scale."

He said he suspects there's not a single Israeli family unaffected by terrorism. His wife was in Jerusalem's Café Hillel a few hours before it was blown up in 2003. She also witnessed the immediate aftermath of a bus bombing while taking their children to school, said the 43-year-old editor and book author, who made aliyah from England in 1983.

Two revolutions have taken place recently in Israel, Horovitz said. In addition to Sharon's "radical" political shift leftward, the Palestinians experienced a "post-Arafat" revolution, when the late PA president Yasser Arafat was succeeded by Mahmoud Abbas, "who was perceived in the Israeli mainstream as a much better person."

Horovitz recalled that Sharon himself told him last year in an interview that Abbas was well-intentioned.

"[Abbas] condemned terrorism, usually as being counterproductive, [but] occasionally as being morally wrong," Horovitz said. He added that he believes Abbas was unwilling to take the risks involved in dismantling Hamas and locking up bombers.

"At the same time as he was failing from the Israeli point of view to counter terrorism, he was failing from the Palestinian public's point of view to reform the way the PA governed," said Horovitz, who was in Ramallah 10 days before the PA elections. He added it was "obvious" that many Palestinians were going to vote for Hamas.

"It seems to me that ordinary Palestinians in very large numbers voted for Hamas primarily because they were totally fed up with the corruption of the Fatah leadership.

"It's not that they were voting for Hamas because of the suicide bombers, [but] plainly the fact that Hamas is determinedly opposed to Israel's existence and the fact it has engaged in relentless terrorism was not enough to deter them."

Horovitz disagrees with people who say Hamas may become more moderate. From a Muslim religious standpoint, it can't accept the notion of Jewish sovereignty, he said.

It may issue some kind of five- or 10-year hudna, he suggested, using the Islamic term for a type of ceasefire. However, he noted, the Islamic precedent would point to Hamas "building up [its] military ability so [it] can eventually vanquish the enemy."

He believes the only prospect of forcing Hamas to change its position "would be if money isn't there to govern." There are ways to channel funding directly to Palestinian recipients without going through Hamas, he said.

Kadima election strategy divisive, editor says

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Toward the end of her scathing critique of the state of Israeli politics, Jerusalem Post columnist Caroline Glick looked up at the audience at the Shaarei Tefillah Congregation, and made an admission.

It pained her to have to describe the Israeli government in such unflattering terms, she conceded.

Though clearly uncomfortable, Glick continued a withering attack on Israeli policy, describing it by turns as reckless, despicable, divisive and morally unjustifiable.

"Is this the beginning of the destruction of the State of Israel or the end of the self-destruction of the Jewish people?" she asked at one point.

A native of Chicago who served in the Israel Defence Forces for five years after making aliyah, Glick said the government of Israel is pursuing policies that endanger the interests of Israel and its Jewish citizens.

It is not protecting Israelis from Hamas, Iran or Hezbollah, each of which now have a base in Gaza, while attempting to turn Israeli society against settlers, wrongly painting them as the reason for an absence of peace with the Palestinians, she said.

Kadima, the centrist part established by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who is in hospital in a coma after suffering a stroke, is courting voters for the March 28 election by demonizing settlers, Glick said.

Not only is the portrayal of the settlers inaccurate, but it alienates a key element of Israeli society for no good purpose, she argued. "Kadima is eroding the will of the people to fight," she said. "How can a nation survive if it says its people are the problem, not the enemy that is trying to kill them?"

Glick, deputy managing editor of the Jerusalem Post, was speaking on the topic "Dangerous times for Israel and the Jewish people," as a guest of the Toronto Zionist Council and Shaarei Tefillah. Her address followed the presentation of a short film about the dismantling and forced evacuation of the tiny settlement of Amona, located nine kilometres north of Jerusalem. The film, presented by Toronto businessman Israel Kaplan, showed repeated instances of violent Israeli police attacks on settlers and their supporters.

Glick said "Amona did not come out of thin air." She traced the ultimate genesis of the event to a decision by Sharon in December 2003 to reverse his campaign promise not to withdraw unilaterally from territories – a campaign promise that earned him a parliamentary majority in coalition with Zionist religious parties, she said.

Sharon reached his decision to withdraw from Gaza and several West Bank settlements after consulting only with his sons, his political advisors and his communications consultants, shutting out the Israeli defence and security establishment. He went ahead with the withdrawal even after he was advised that serious security consequences would result. The IDF's chief of staff, Moshe Ya'alon, was fired in 2005 after he warned of the security threats, Glick said.

Sharon was warned that a unilateral withdrawal would be seen as a victory by the forces of global jihad, and that Ashkelon, just north of the Gaza border, as well as its power station and the Eilat/Ashkelon pipeline, would be put in jeopardy, and that Gaza would become a terror base like Afghanistan under the Taliban.

All these consequences have come to pass, Glick stated, with Gaza turned into a forward base for Hamas, Hezbollah (a client of Iran) and even Al Qaeda.

Heavy arms such as mortars, anti-aircraft missiles and anti-tank weapons are being smuggled in, and these will eventually find their way to the West Bank, placing Jerusalem and even Ben-Gurion International Airport within range of Palestinian fire, she said.

Imagine the consequences to the Israeli economy if a rocket lands near the airport, Glick suggested.

Iran, she continued, has promised to give Hamas $250 million (US) because "it wants to control what happens in the Palestinian Authority."

Hamas, she said, are "present-day Nazis" who threaten to destroy Israel and kill Jews. "They say it because they mean it and they are doing everything they can to do it."

In the face of these threats, the Israeli government under Kadima has turned its focus not on Israel's real enemies, but on the settlers, "demonizing and dehumanizing" them and religious Zionists. They have been called "messianics, fascists [who] incite violence and refuse to acknowledge the rule of law," she said.

"This is the strategy of Kadima to win," she added.

Glick – who served as assistant foreign policy advisor to former Israeli prime minister Binyamin Netanyahu, a longtime rival of Sharon's when they were both in the Likud party – suggested that contrary to Kadima's assertions, settlers are key to Israel's survival and viability.

She pointed to Lebanon as a test case. Israel lost control of southern Lebanon when it chose to base its troops in fortified positions and ceased patrolling the highways. That turned the countryside over to Hezbollah, leading to Israel's eventual withdrawal, she said.

Under the Oslo accords, Israel turned over large areas of the West Bank to the Palestinian Authority and stopped patrolling Palestinian cities. That gave Palestinians freedom to launch murderous terrorist attacks, culminating in the March 2002 wave of violence in which 130 Israelis were killed and no one felt safe anywhere, Glick said.

When the IDF responded with Operation Defensive Shield, it retook Palestinian towns and roads and brought the war to the Palestinians. Because of the demands of settlers to be able to come and go freely, the IDF patrols bypass roads and the result has been fewer attacks against Israel, she added.

Glick urged Canadian Jews to speak out against the policy of demonizing settlers and blaming them for the continuing conflict. She said Canadians can refuse to donate money to an Israeli government that "persecutes" Jews.

Group advocates for Israeli Arabs in election run-up

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

Israel's Arab citizens – who represent 20 per cent of the country's population – lack proportionate access to state resources in areas such as health care, education and economic development, said an executive director of a group that advocates for Israeli Arabs.

The human rights repercussions are undeniable, said Shalom (Shuli) Dichter, the Jewish co-executive director of Sikkuy: the Association for the Advancement of Civic Equality, speaking to a small group at a private home in Toronto recently.

He noted that the Arab infant mortality rate is more than double that of Jews; there are many preventable deaths from lung and breast cancer among Arabs; and Arab women are being systematically denied opportunity.

Israel may be the beacon of democracy that Jews are so proud of, but quoting one of his Arab colleagues, Dichter said: "Israel is democratic to Jews… and Jewish to Arabs."

Jews and Arabs are "two tectonic plates" underlying Israel's security, he said, and this month's elections are an opportunity to stabilize those foundations and eliminate the dangers of an unequal society.

"Nobody says anymore that there is no discrimination in Israel," he said. Now, the "distinction is between those who claim that this is the way things should be versus those who support rectifying this situation."

Many Jews, both within and outside of Israel, explain away the dichotomy either in terms of Jewish entitlement or Arab unwillingness to co-operate, Dichter said.

While Jews may see increased access to resources as contingent on greater support from Israel's Arab citizens, he said, asking "are they loyal enough?" undermines our moral imperative and jeopardizes the well-being of all Israelis. "The state's job is to ensure that resources are distributed equally."

Shalom (Shuli) Dichter is the Jewish co-executive director of Sikkuy: the Association for the Advancement of Civic Equality, an Israeli organization run by Jews and Arabs.

Nevertheless, he said, 66 per cent of Israeli Arabs do support Israel as a Jewish state. "They feel a belonging to the State of Israel despite all differences" and "feel a part of Israel, despite the discrimination."

Dichter, a former elementary school teacher, thinks of his advocacy work as a form of "adult education."

He acknowledged that all participants in the equally Jewish- and Arab-run Sikkuy come to the table "working from their own interest." Its board of directors includes Jews and Arabs drawn from their communities' mainstream. "The Jews are Zionists, the Arabs are 'Palestinianists' – they represent the authentic interests of both sides," he said.

Universal harmony is not the goal, and many topics are off the table. "We don't always have the same agenda, but equality in sharing resources is in the interest of both sides," Dichter said.

Sikkuy's agenda includes a 10-year plan that calls for establishment of an "equality authority," comprising representatives of both communities, to oversee all government ministries in order to eliminate disparities.

The organization hopes to gain government support for its plan as well as to build co-operation through its Jewish-Arab Mayors' Forum and to establish shared industrial zones.

Sikkuy plans to mount a public-education campaign aimed at both Jewish and Arab Israelis, which it has started in the current election campaign. "The government is completely, directly dependent on public opinion," Dichter said.

Ordinary Israelis can affect the political process, he said, citing the 2000 grassroots-initiated pullout from Lebanon.

"Officials and ministers listen to public discourse every day," he said – particularly in an election year.

Sikkuy is calling on voters to choose a leader in the March 28 election who endorses its platform "in favour of resource allocation without distinction of religion, race or ethnic affiliation," Dichter said.

Echoing a call to kill

Last week, haredi Jews from the group Neturei Karta visited Tehran. They were not there as tourists. They were there to publicly and ostentatiously lend their support to the government of Iran and, in particular, to President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and his policies.

As reported by JTA, in a statement to Iran's official IRIB radio, the visitors called for "the disintegration of the Zionist regime" and defended Ahmadinejad, saying that it "is a dangerous deviation to pretend that the Iranian president is an anti-Jewish or anti-Semitic personality." The head of the delegation, Rabbi Yisroel Dovid Weiss, was reported to have praised Ahamadinejad's "enlightening" statements denying the Holocaust and threatening Israel.

The Neturei Karta believes fervently that the creation of the State of Israel was a heretical intervention by human beings into the affairs of God. Only the Messiah, they believe, can establish a sovereign Jewish state, not man. But the group and its leader, Rabbi Moshe Hirsh, have not left their theological disagreement to the realm of religious disputation. Over the years, they have very visibly laid hands of encouragement upon the shoulders of Israel's enemies. Last week's display, however, crossed all boundaries of doctrinal difference. It was not merely an in-your-face, political-theological protest.

By lending support to Ahmadinejad's rabid anti-Israel policies, the Neturei Karta echoed his call to "wipe out" the State of Israel. The implications of that call are too horrible to imagine, yet not too horrible for haters of Jews to attempt. Only God, ultimately, can rebuke Neturei Karta's theology, but we can rebuke and reject their behaviour. It was vile, disgusting and a source of great communal shame.

Echoing a call to build

One week before the Neturei Karta delegation visited Iran, a delegation of some 20 affiliates of the Assembly of First Nations (AFN) visited Israel. Led by AFN national Chief Phil Fontaine, the delegation toured Israel as part of an educational and cultural exchange with the Canadian Jewish Congress.

During their visit, the group met with Israeli President Moshe Katsav, who urged his visitors to "keep your heritage and revive your language." It was a message that Fontaine and his colleagues took to heart, for one of the group's goals was to see if the revitalization of Hebrew holds useful lessons for the preservation and revitalization of Canadian indigenous languages.

"The trip was overwhelming," Fontaine told The CJN. "Israel and the First Nations share a common interest," he said. "Our interest is in building bridges."

The difference in the visits by the Neturei Karta to Iran and the AFN to Israel is telling and sad: between advocating tolerance and peace or advocating hatred and terror. We stand with, and thank, the AFN.

Jewish Canadians and Israeli policies

Israel does not and has never claimed to speak in the name of Jewish people around the world ("Group opposes Israeli government policies," CJN, March 9). Governments of Israel do what they think is right for Israelis. Michael Benazon and Michael Mandel (and co-signatories), if you wish to tell the government what to do, move to Israel, pay your taxes and cast your votes there. Jewish Canadians have no right to tell Israel what is right or wrong. I may have different opinions, but I will always support Israel irrespective of what government Israelis choose: whether it be Labor, Kadima or Likud, it's their choice – not mine. After all, Italians, Germans or Russians living here have no right to tell Italian, German or Russian governments what to do.

Day school funding (1)

The article "Assessment of World Jewry" (CJN, March 2) included a table that compared day-school attendance rates of Jewish communities in various countries all over the world. Canada was listed as having a very impressive rate of 55 per cent. However, it is important to contrast this rate with the rate in Ontario. The numbers, often used by the community, are apparently much lower, hovering somewhere between 25 and 35 per cent of school-aged children. This difference between day school attendance rates in Ontario and the rest of Canada is alarming, considering the size of the Jewish community in Ontario (which is the largest in Canada).

The reason for this discrepancy should be obvious to all. All other Canadian provinces that have Jewish day schools, including British Columbia, Alberta, Manitoba and Quebec, provide a significant level of support to their faith-based schools. This enables these schools to maintain their tuition fees at a manageable level so that no child is excluded for financial reasons.

Ontario is the only province with Jewish day schools that refuses to provide any funding for non-Catholic, faith-based schools. Consequently, tuition fees are skyrocketing. This means that many lower- and middle-income families cannot even consider Jewish day school education as an option unless they are willing to live in a compromised situation (that is, not able to pay their household bills on time or provide basic necessities to their families). If this situation continues unchecked, it will pose an increasing threat to Jewish continuity, not only in Ontario but also in all of Canada.

Statistics such as these prove the dramatic negative effect that Ontario's ongoing discrimination against non-Catholic, faith-based school users has on the struggle of minority communities like ours for cultural continuity.

Day school funding (2)

I am writing with respect to the status of the two publicly funded school systems that exist to preserve the so-called "minority rights" of a particular denominational religious group in Ontario, namely, Roman Catholics. The preferential treatment accorded to this religious group is in direct violation of not only several United Nations articles, but is inimical to any sort of progress in terms of Canada and Ontario being taken seriously nationally and internationally. For how can we condemn human rights violations occurring in other states if Canada is itself in violation of acts that it condemns other jurisdictions for perpetrating? As well, the duplication of services and added tax burden (approximately $200 million per year) bestowed upon the hardworking taxpayers of this province as a result of operating two publicly funded systems demands reform. Reform, contrary to statements made by Ontario MPPs, could be facilitated with or without amending the constitution.

Catholic parents are the only religious group in Ontario that can consider factors such as academic performance and reputation, school culture, availability of programs and location in determining which of their fully funded options to exercise. Ontario is now the only jurisdiction in the free world that practises such discrimination since Quebec and Newfoundland abolished denominational school funding in 1999 and 1998, respectively.

Group dedicated to Falash Mora

The article "Canadians see dire conditions of remaining Ethiopian Jews" (CJN, March 2) presented the conditions of the Falash Mora and the impact that United Israel Appeal-Federations Canada's (UIAFC) mission has had on its participants. However, the article did not acknowledge the many years of dedicated work and funding of the North American Conference on Ethiopian Jewry (NACOEJ).

NACOEJ has for the past 15 years funded the exceptional programs highlighted in the article, ensuring that thousands of people are fed every day and educated while awaiting aliyah. NACOEJ has also taken on a supportive role during this transitory period in which the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) and Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) will take over these extraordinary programs.

350 years of the Jewish community in England

By PAUL SHAVIV

Popular legend has it that 350 years ago, in early 1656, Oliver Cromwell "readmitted" the Jews to England, from which they had been expelled in 1290 by King Edward I.

Cromwell supposedly did this as a result of the lobbying and pamphleteering of an exotic Amsterdam rabbi, Menasseh ben Israel, who persuaded Cromwell that the Redemption would never come until the Jews were dispersed to all corners of the earth. Thus, if the Jews were not permitted to live in England, was this not impeding the coming of the Messiah?

As is the case with many historical traditions, the facts are a little different. This romantic view of the "readmission," perhaps more correctly called the "resettlement," seems to have had its birth in 1906, when its 250th anniversary was celebrated by a sumptuous London banquet, attended by the "great and the good" of Victorian Anglo-Jewry. As a perceptive contemporary historian wrote, there was a "search for founding fathers" – and what better contrasting pair could the Victorian romantics suggest than the dashing, mysterious, mystic Amsterdam rabbi, patron and friend of Rembrandt, and the Puritan, upright, biblically inspired lord protector of England, Oliver Cromwell?

But Cromwell never made any decision to readmit Jews to England. In the face of opposition from his clerics, he seems to have been reluctant to take a stand on the matter. On the other hand, he raised no objections to the increasingly public profile of Jews in London's busy commercial life who were using a number of thin subterfuges, presenting themselves as "Portuguese" or other merchants.

By the middle of 1656, the identity of these people as Jews was public, but not necessarily because of Rabbi Menasseh ben Israel's activities. The London Jewish community was led by Antonio Fernando Carvajal, an established merchant with close government ties in the bullion market. Signing himself as "Abraham Israel Carvajal," he and others petitioned Cromwell as "Hebrews at present residing in this citty [sic] of London" for official permission to conduct public worship, to acquire a burial ground, and for "protection."

On March 24, 1656, Cromwell endorsed their petition with his signature, making their status unchallengeable. Caravajal thus has a much more persuasive claim than Rabbi Menasseh ben Israel to the title of "founder of the modern Anglo-Jewish community." The rabbi, isolated and suffering the tragedy of the death of his son in London, returned to Holland where he died in poverty.

From the middle of the 17th century, Jews immigrated to England in increasing numbers. For almost a century, Sephardim from Amsterdam were the community leaders, although there was an underclass of Ashkenazi pedlars, orange-sellers and old clothes dealers.

By the late 18th century, Jews were well-established in British society. At this time, the great Anglo-Jewish aristocratic dynasties of the 19th and 20th centuries were founded – the Goldsmids, the Cohens, the Rothschilds, the Montefiores, the Samuels, the Montagus and the Mocattas – overwhelmingly the offspring by descent or marriage of Levi Barent Cohen (1740-1808), a Dutch merchant who married off his children exceedingly well.

The German Ashkenazi immigration of the early 19th century was entirely swamped by the great Polish-Russian immigration of 1880 to 1914. Hundreds of thousands of Jews arrived in the East End of London and other provincial centres. Their children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren were to constitute the backbone of the Anglo-Jewish community of the 20th century.

From the end of World War I, the Jewish community in England grew and prospered. Anti-Semitism, World War II and the tension at the time of the British Mandate over Palestine all served to shape community policy and community consciousness. Britain, never a nation of immigrants, expected social and cultural conformity, and a high measure of assimilation. There was no prestige attached to ethnic identity.

Seven London Jews, headed by Rabbi Manasseh Ben Israel, sent this petition to Lord Protector Oliver Cromwell in 1655 asking that Jews be given the right to hold services in their own homes. [Encyclopedia Judaica]

Anglo-Jewry kept a meek and low profile, and tried very hard to model itself on the Anglican Church. Its institutions – the United Synagogue, the Board of Deputies (its representative body), its welfare organizations – never achieved, or even aspired to, the power, the funding or the determination of their North American counterparts. Sedate communal reticence ruled. When Rabbi Israel Brodie became chief rabbi of the British Empire in June 1948, six weeks after the creation of the State of Israel, he did not mention that event once in his induction speech, referring only obliquely to a biblical verse mentioning ancient Israel.

In the 1950s, '60s, and '70s, British Jews flourished economically and politically. The old "cousinhood" – Levi Barent Cohen's ennobled aristocratic family – relinquished their leadership of communal institutions in favour of the second generation of the eastern European immigrants. Under friendly prime ministers of different political parties – Harold Wilson (Labour) and Margaret Thatcher (Tory) – Jews achieved exceptional political prominence in government and politics. (The last of the great aristocratic Tories, Sir Harold Macmillan, noted acidly of Margaret Thatcher's cabinet that there were "more old Estonians than old Etonians" running the country.)

Marks and Spencer (the Sieffs and Sachars), Tesco (Sir John Cohen), and Great Universal Stores (Sir Isaac Wolfson) were powerful forces in British retailing. The community enjoyed less the publicity about the large number of its members in the property development sector. The doyen of British academia was Sir Isaiah Berlin in Oxford.

Despite the outstanding Jewish contribution to every field of culture, science, commerce, industry and politics, the Jewish dimension of Anglo-Jewry was stagnant. It retained a definite Victorian flavour, and it was regarded as faintly embarrassing to be Jewish.

Jewish scholarship in England has never flourished and has never attracted the community support – or participation – that it has in North America. The faculties of Jewish studies in U.K. Universities (such as they are) are peripheral to Jewish community life, even though in the British Library, the Bodleian Library at Oxford and the University Library in Cambridge, the United Kingdom holds three of the world's most important collections of Hebrew and Judaica.

Thinkers and scholars, especially those of an original or radical inclination, are not favourite sons (let alone daughters). Rabbi Louis Jacobs was frozen out of the U.K. Jewish establishment. Two successive chief rabbis, the late Lord Immanuel Jakobovits and his brilliant successor, Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, have both had to navigate stormy waters within their own constituencies – the former for his doveish political views on the Arab-Israel conflict, the latter for his theology. Paradoxically, both immeasurably enhanced the status of the Chief Rabbinate and of Judaism generally in British public life.

With no equivalent to a North American federation, British Jewry is organizationally fragmented. There is no central fundraising, little co-operation between a series of "stand-alone" organizations, and, to the North American observer, a strange lack of "community" feeling. Its numbers are declining – most community organizations talk about some 300,000 people, a significant drop over the last 50 years.

The "glue" of Anglo-Jewry is the world's oldest independent Jewish newspaper, the Jewish Chronicle, still going strong after more than 160 years. So great is its position in the community that its most famous and beloved columnist, the late Chaim Bermant, once suggested as a solution to the "Who is a Jew?" question, at least as far as the U.K. was concerned: "anyone who reads the Jewish Chronicle."

Despite many signs of grassroots revival in the last few years, British Jewry is more uneasy today than it has been for decades.

Positive signs include remarkable growth in (mainly government-funded) day schools, although with much weaker Judaic curricula than in other communities, a remarkable resurgence of the traditional community and a perceptibly higher interest in Jewish cultural and adult educational projects. The non-denominational Limmud conferences started in the United Kingdom, and the U.K. event now attracts over 2,000 participants a year.

However, a significant Muslim minority in the U.K., outnumbering the Jewish community several times over, has caused a perceptible cooling toward Jews and Judaism in political circles. It is no longer fashionable, or comfortable, to be Jewish in polite society, especially when admitting to any Israel connection or visit.

Anti-Israel sentiment is fierce and increasing, characterized by threats of boycott in academic and commercial spheres, movements led largely by anti-Zionist Jews and former, and in some cases, present Israelis. The Church of England Synod voted recently to "recommend" disinvestment from Israel – a move which the present Archbishop of Canterbury supported, but to which his predecessor angrily and publicly objected. British newspapers and the BBC have published numerous grossly offensive cartoons, articles and news reports about Israel and Jews, to the point of obsession – certainly well past the point of reason.

In a rapidly-changing Europe, Anglo-Jewry is facing challenges not faced – and perhaps not even imagined – in the 3½ centuries of its modern existence. Its past may be celebrated; its future – and its preparedness for that future – is a lot less certain.

Paul Shaviv, director of education of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, here writing in a personal capacity, was born and educated in the United Kingdom.

Beat the deadline

An e-mail arrived recently from my ever-patient editor stating: "Reminder: Today is the deadline for your column." Of course, I had forgotten about the deadline, and I hurried to finish in time.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Deadlines work. They motivate procrastinators to finally get something done. They also push people to make quick decisions. That's why the Home Shopping Network will announce that "there are only 23 minutes left to buy this item." Deadlines come when a window of opportunity is closing, and people don't like missing opportunities.

There's something jarring about the word deadline. And when that e-mail arrived, the word reminded me of that ultimate deadline: death.

We often ignore this ultimate deadline. Woody Allen put it this way: "It's not that I'm afraid to die, I just don't want to be there when it happens." Indeed, the midrash says that the ability to repress thoughts of death is a divine gift, without which we'd become depressed and cease to be productive.

But disregarding death is a mistake. The Bible says "the heart of the wise man is in the house of mourning." A house of mourning can be a house of learning, with the ultimate deadline teaching the lessons.

Life is easily wasted. The famous proverb, "Live each day as if it were the last," reminds us that the key to life is beating the ultimate deadline. Enjoy life before it's too late. The Talmud says, "Grab and eat, grab and drink, for this world we will leave is like a banquet." Live a meaningful life right now. Rabbi Eliezer says you must repent every day, because each day may be your last. Life's too short to ignore our spiritual possibilities.

Death also teaches us what's truly important. Our priorities change if we consider what our legacy will be. A French newspaper prematurely published an obituary for Alfred Nobel, the inventor of dynamite. Nobel read his own "obituary" and, disturbed by its critical tone, decided to create a better legacy for himself by establishing the Nobel Prizes.

You don't need to establish (or win) a Nobel Prize to create a legacy. Even small acts of greatness count. The Talmud tells of an elderly man who planted a carob tree, which takes 70 years to bear fruit. A rabbi asked him: do you expect to eat carob fruit 70 years from now? The man answered that he was planting the tree for his children, much as his father before him planted trees for him. This simple tree was his legacy, an act of intergenerational love that lives on, well past any deadlines.

I hope my editor is happy this column was on time. I also hope that some day, when I face the great editor upstairs, I will have everything in order – in time for the deadline.

May his memory be a democratic blessing

Headlines like "British Historian David Irving jailed for denying the Holocaust" make me cringe. Irving uses historians' tools to give lies a seemingly authoritative veneer. But does such despicable conduct deserve three years in an Austrian jail? At a time when enlightened democrats should be defending newspapers' rights to publish Danish cartoons, even if some Muslims find them offensive, imprisoning anyone for a thought crime is foolish. Ideas – be they noble or noxious – cannot be jailed.

Gil Troy in Montreal

For three weeks this winter, while Muslims rioted against cartoons and Irving was being sentenced, a gang of mostly Muslim kidnappers in France tortured to death a 23-year-old cellphone salesman. During some ransom calls, relatives heard Ilan Halimi scream as his torturers read verses from the Qur'an and burned him. Skittish French police, press and politicians first characterized the crime as financial, not anti-Semitic, even though the kidnappers assumed Halimi's modest relatives could meet their demands because "Jews are rich." One kidnapper later admitted: "We put our cigarettes out on him because he was a Jew."

The Austrian authorities' heavy hand and the French authorities' initial neglect highlight the difficulties in fighting poisonous ideas. In our age of big government, hate crime legislation seems a natural response. It clarifies society's moral stance, gives leaders political cover, and seeks to scare bigots. But criminalizing thought violates one of free societies' central building blocks. It is self-defeating to sacrifice our faith in liberty to fight those who violate that faith.

Yes, enlightened secular democracies require leaps of faith. We choose to believe that the people can pick better leaders than insiders could. We choose to believe that the chaos of maximizing freedoms promotes more individual happiness and fairness than more orderly, centralized, decision making and standard-setting by elites. And we choose to believe that the free marketplace of ideas can best distinguish workable, noble ideals from outmoded reprehensible prejudices.

Hate crime laws are lazy, undermining that sifting process. Does anyone need the Austrian government – which has denied its own people's complicity in Nazi crimes – to teach that denying the murder of six million people is illogical and immoral? And while the French establishment's resistance to recognize Halimi's kidnapping as a hate crime frustrated his family and offends those committed to combating this evil by exposing it honestly, French hate crime legislation was no more effective in inhibiting the barbarians than were French laws prohibiting kidnapping.

Law is best at regulating deeds not thoughts, punishing actions not motives. Civil society must tackle more abstract challenges of fostering openness, acceptance, civility and equality. The response to Halimi's murder should be humanistic, not legalistic, and democratic, not autocratic. We need mass outrage, educational initiatives, social sanctions, enlightened debates, sweeping denunciations, not thicker law books.

Muslim clerics, French leaders, local celebrities, state educators, and parents should use their smarts and moral power to root out this rot from French society – and other corners of the world – as part of a broader assault on intolerance. European leaders should connect the dots and shun Hamas representatives until that organization repudiates its anti-Semitic, anti-Western, terrorist-romanticizing ideology. Only bold steps will change attitudes toward Jews and other targeted groups, especially in France where the New York Times reported that one Christian charity distributes free pork meals to serve "their" poor people, not Jews or Muslims.

Last month, hundreds of thousands of people in Paris, along with others in smaller rallies in Marseille and elsewhere, showed that they could meet this challenge peacefully, without rioting. Muslim, Jewish, and Christian clerics marched together. "ILAN TORTURED, FRANCE WOUNDED," one banner declared, while protesters cried, "Vive la France" and "la Justice," thus transforming the fight against anti-Semitism from a Jewish issue into a more universal French and human issue.

The protesters chose to believe that their voices, passion, and idealism could change hearts and minds. The marchers joined a proud, historic democratic parade, trusting vision, not violence, and liberty, not law, to help us all, individually and together, create the kind of world where a David Irving would be shamed and shunned, not jailed, into silence, and an Ilan Halimi could have lived the long, happy life he deserved.

May Halimi's memory be a blessing and spur all of us to embrace the kinds of democratic ideals his murderers should have learned at home, in school, in the mosque and on the street.

The way we were, or weren't

I've always been a bit in awe of historians and the way that they bring the light of knowledge into the world. They resemble the dashing private investigators that glamorize detective fiction, piecing together bits of this and bits of that – fragments that, to the untutored eye, seem inconsequential, but to the skillful, reveal important aspects of times past.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Historians do three important things. They fill gaps in our knowledge, telling us things about the past that we did not know before. They reinterpret the past, compelling us to take a fresh look at what we thought we knew, but now need to rethink. And they shatter some of the myths we have of the past, pressing us to critically examine our ideas about the way we think we were.

Jews have a special relationship to the past. Jewish festivals involve not only ritual but recounting. Most of us draw our ideas of the Jewish past from vaguely remembered history textbooks and lectures, historical novels and television programs that play fast and loose with facts, and Hollywood productions that mix it up with romance, drama, and sensationalism. Overlaid on all this, our present sense of values and identity shapes the version of the past to which we feel strongly bound. The way we are, in other words, influences our ideas about the way we were.

Take the subject of women and Judaism. I recently heard two presentations about the role of Jewish women. Each presenter was an Orthodox Israeli woman, and each began from the same assumption: that the role of Jewish women in the past had been constant and unvarying, and that our own era was bringing unprecedented changes. Jewish women had "always" been relegated to the home, to child-rearing and domestic chores, and kept out of the public sphere. One woman cautioned her listeners against departing heedlessly from what she described as the values of the Jewish past. The other woman, in contrast, urged her listeners to plunge courageously into what she described as the world of the Jewish future.

Although the two women disagreed on the appropriate steps, they shared a unified vision of the past. If they had been mapmakers, we might say that they agreed on the configuration of roads, but not on the direction to travel.

But the work of contemporary historians who study the Jewish people questions the accuracy of that map. In both Israel and North America, researchers of Jewish history and Jewish texts offer findings that prod us to complicate our understanding of the past, overturning common assumptions.

According to the latest research, for example, the Jewish regulation of marriage and divorce offered women more power at certain times and places in our history than it does today.

According to Israeli historian Renee Levine Melammed, who studies the Cairo Geniza, for instance, a repository for Jewish documents from the 10th century onwards, ketubot (marriage documents) in the Geniza frequently contained a clause forbidding a husband to take a second wife or concubine without the express permission of his wife.

In Europe, notes Avraham Grossman, a Hebrew University professor who researches Jewish history in the Middle Ages, women performed a range of ritual acts that had been reserved for men, and took leadership roles in the community. In certain moments in Jewish history, he observes, Jewish men and women approached equality in marriage. And both Grossman and Elimelech Westreich, a Tel Aviv University professor and former Israel Defence Forces rabbi, note that Jewish women were effectively able to initiate divorce proceedings during the Middle Ages.

Along with other Jewish historians, they point out that the status of women in Jewish society is linked to economics. During periods of affluence, woman's stature rises, in large measure as women attain some measure of economic independence.

These new historical findings enrich our sense of the Jewish past. Rather than projecting present values onto the past, we are offered a window onto a complex and dynamic society. To return to the metaphor of the map, we see not only the footpaths that grew into today's highways, but also the hidden trails and scenic roads that fell into disrepair but might yet be refurbished.

The Kirshner File

Welcome to the club, Krystyna Lagowski

It happened one day more than a decade ago, when Krystyna Lagowski was 32. Her parents, Andrew and Dorota Joanna, had just split up, ending a "hellish" marriage. Shortly afterward, Lagowski's father showed her a remarkable affidavit in which her mother stated that she was born Jewish and accused her husband of having been an anti-Semite.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

"I thought she was nuts, out to lunch," said Lagowski, a feisty redhead of medium height who has a rapid-fire style of speech. "I couldn't get in touch with her at the time, so I asked my father if she was indeed Jewish. The answer was yes. When I asked why no one had ever told me, he said, 'You never asked.'"

The revelation jolted Lagowski, a freelance automotive journalist and former advertising copywriter who had always been proud of her Polish Catholic heritage, but who, nevertheless, had been inexplicably drawn to Judaism.

"I felt stupid and thrilled," she explained one recent afternoon. "Stupid, because my mother had been dropping hints about her Jewish past. Thrilled, because I was Jewish."

Having stripped away and exposed a family secret, Lagowski suddenly felt liberated, free to explore her Jewish roots.

"Welcome to the club," a Jewish friend exclaimed, greeting the news of Lagowski's newfound Jewishness with a sense of joy and perhaps even a touch of giddiness.

Lagowski was thus launched on an extraordinary journey of self-discovery, an odyssey that has sharply clarified her childhood memories and prompted her to look at the world through Jewish eyes.

But Lagowski is hardly unique. She has several friends and acquaintances who have had similar experiences.

Only now, with a smidgen of annoyance, does she realize that she missed all her mother's clues about her dual ancestry.

She knew that her mother had gone through difficult times during World War II and had spent a few years as a kitchen maid in the Bavarian town of Berchtesgaden, near Adolf Hitler's Eagle's Nest summer residence in the Alps.

But she attached no significance to these facts. Nor did Lagowski ascribe any importance to her mother's offhanded disclosure that some of her distant relatives were Jewish.

As well, Lagowski missed other clues. On Christmas eve, gefilte fish, a signature Jewish dish, would magically appear on the dinner table. When they watched White Christmas, a film starring Danny Kaye, Lagowski's mother took note of Kaye's Jewish pedigree. Her mom also made a point of taking Lagowski to Funny Girl – the movie in which Barbra Streisand portrays the Jewish entertainer Fanny Brice – and leaving a copy of Anne Frank's diary on her bed.

Born in Toronto, Lagowski was raised in a traditional Polish home, complete with all the trimmings. She and her older brother, Larry, a lawyer, were baptized and learned Polish, a language in which she is fluent. "I speak Polish to my cats," she said. "Polish has a wonderful rustling sound to it."

On certain occasions, Lagowski dressed up in a Polish folk costume, and she liked listening to Polish songs. Lagowski also played Poland's national anthem on the piano and was partial to Polish cuisine, especially jellied pig's feet. A regular churchgoer who dutifully recited her prayers in Polish, she met Karol Wojtyla then a Polish cardinal and later Pope John Paul II – when she was 13. And like many of her friends, she spent blissful summers in Barry's Bay, a Polish resort in Muskoka.

"I was a real Polish girl," she chortled.

Her parents settled in Canada in 1948, living first in Montreal and then in Toronto. They were hardworking immigrants who scrimped and saved to give their children a bright future.

Lagowski's mother, now 87, comes from Czestochowa, a city that has drawn pilgrims to the Black Madonna shrine, or Jasna Gora, for centuries. Born as Dorota Salome Milstein, she hailed from a very assimilated Jewish family. She studied domestic science and, by all accounts, was a gifted pianist. When the Nazis invaded Poland on Sept. 1, 1939, she was in Warsaw. There she caught the last civilian train to Lvov to join her parents, Maurycy and Bronislawa (Davidowich).

In 1941, after they were placed in Lvov's ghetto, Maurycy was taken into custody, never to be seen again. Bronislawa was rounded up in 1942 and disappeared without a trace. Dorota, having obtained papers identifying her as Joanna Litniowska, a Christian, sneaked out of the ghetto. "She just walked out and kept on walking," said Lagowski.

Several Poles "outed" Dorota as a Jew, but without any dire consequences. Dorota successfully passed as a Catholic as she made her way to the German resort of Berchtesgaden. Perversely enough, she believed that she would be safer in Germany than in Poland. She met her husband-to-be, Andrew Lagowski, a soldier in the Polish army who had been captured and sent to a prisoner-of-war camp in Berchtesgaden, after the war.

When hostilities ended, he climbed aboard a special freight train in Berchtesgaden that had been commandeered by none other than Herrmann Goering, a top-flight Nazi. Much to his amazement, he found looted art treasures and Goering's personal possessions in the carriages. "He didn't grab a Rodin or a Matisse, but a radio," said Lagowski in mock exasperation. She used the radio until it stopped working in the 1970s.

Since Lagowski's mother had no desire to return to Poland or live in Israel, she immigrated to Canada, where she met Andrew Lagowski yet again. After a brief courtship in Montreal and her conversion to Christianity, they were married in a church. Lagowski believes that she adopted Christianity to please her husband and disengage from Judaism.

Lagowski had a happy childhood, thanks in no small part to her father, who is now 88. An electrical engineer who also holds a law degree, he was an incredibly charming man whom all her friends adored. He took her everywhere: skating, tobogganing, fishing and to ballet lessons.

"I was daddy's girl. He had a big influence on me."

A University of Toronto dropout and a Sheridan College graduate, Lagowski has no childhood recollections that he was anti-Semitic. But before she severed ties with him seven years ago, in a painful incident that she will never forget, he allegedly told her that Jews are avaricious moneylenders.

Their relationship broke apart after a bitter dispute during which he sided with his girlfriend, a fervently religious Polish woman half his age.

Nor is Lagowski on speaking terms with her brother, who, she said, denies his Jewish background and claims that Jews in Nazi-occupied Poland built the ghettos themselves.

Lagowski, however, maintains excellent relations with her mother, a resident of Oakville. "We have a wonderful relationship that I treasure. But I don't push the Jewish thing."

According to Lagowski, her mother is delusional and reclusive and rarely talks to anyone but her. She continues to conceal her Jewish background and feels most at ease in her role as a Catholic.

"She has a lot of emotional problems, the result of the war and my father's attitude toward her Jewishness."

Lagowski, who wore a Star of David necklace during the interview, is completely comfortable in her own skin and considers herself thoroughly Jewish. As she put it, "I was born with a Jewish soul."

[Rochelle Michaels photo]

"But I'm not a particularly nice Jewish girl," she quipped. Being non-traditional, she neither goes to synagogue nor keeps kosher. But she makes a point of attending the seders and family picnics of Shirley Shnier, a Torontonian who "adopted" her.

For the past two years, she has been an active member of the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation, which tries to build bridges of understanding between Jews and Poles.

Although she has never set foot in Poland, she hopes to visit some day. Lagowski is deeply interested in Polish Jewish history and the Holocaust and, not surprisingly, is sensitive to anti-Semitic slights and slurs.

She has not formed an attachment to Israel, but may one day.

"A lot this is still developing. Like Farfel, my cat, I've discovered my Jewish identity late in life. I'm still a new Jew."

A divorcee whose former husband was an ethnic German, Lagowski looks forward to exploring and consolidating her Jewish identity.

"I'm fiercely proud of being a Polish Jew," she said. "This is a rich, vibrant culture that should be celebrated."

Tel Aviv One brings future leaders together

Mission highlights local achievements in Israel

By CARLA LANCIT
UJA Federation

Like many Jewish Torontonians, Miriam Elmaleh donates money to UJA Federation, but, until now, hadn't seen its effects firsthand.

That all changed with a recent trip to Israel.

Elmaleh was part of a group of 10 Torontonians who participated in the recent Tel Aviv One mission.

The mission, sponsored by United Jewish Communities' (UJC) National Young Leadership division, brought more than 1,200 young Jewish leaders, ages 25-35, from across North America and around the world to Israel for the opportunity to forge connections among themselves and with Israel, and to ensure a new generation of committed Jewish leadership.

"Our goal is to create an experience that will engage, involve and make you think in new ways about you, Israel and your local community," Tel Aviv One co-chair Cindy Attias told delegates at the opening plenary session. "We want to give you many reasons to connect with us."

Programming featured speakers, entertainers, interactive learning and international relationship-building.

Elmaleh, who has been to Israel twice before, says that Tel Aviv One was a "good opportunity to meet people from all over North America, and see how the communities are doing."

Prior to the conference, the Torontonians visited Eilat, UJA Federation's twinned city through its Partnership 2000 (P2K) initiative.

There they took a tour of the old neighborhood, and were shown the Project Renewal area. The group also had the opportunity to visit some of the projects that receive assistance from Toronto's Jewish community.

"It's a wonderful opportunity to see and meet the people," says Maya Talmon-Chvaicer, UJA Federation's Israeli emissary, who travelled with the group. "You can see the changes, and feel that people are making a difference. Not only from Torontonians giving money, but also Israelis who are giving their own time and energy."

The first stop was a community centre built by Toronto. Then, at the local fire station, participants saw a fire engine donated by the Toronto Jewish community.

At Begin High school they met grade 11 students who participated in a group called pre-Atidim, and at the local campus of Ben Gurion University they met with scholarship students who patrol the streets of Eilat at night.

"Every group that we went to visit we connected with immediately," says Elmaleh.

For Elmaleh, though, the most touching activity was a visit to Or Shalom, a group home that houses at-risk Israeli children. There they played with the kids and shared the special treat of a pizza dinner. "Seeing the hope in their eyes and the smiles on their faces, emotions came over me."

The trip will have a lasting effect. Elmaleh and her fellow participants plan to hold a fundraising event when they return to Toronto. "I'm really proud of what Toronto's doing here," she says. "People should know more what we're doing to help the people of Eilat. We will definitely come home and spread the word."

Abbas must determine his role with Hamas, says Middle East expert

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Palestinian Authority President, Mahmoud Abbas has to make a momentous decision, whether he will be a "counterweight or fig leaf" towards a new Hamas government.

That's the opinion of David Makovsky, Senior Fellow and Director of the Washington Institute's Project on the Middle East Peace Process. Makovsky was in Toronto recently as the keynote speaker at UJA Federation's Partners' Circle Dinner.

Partners' Circle, a special initiative of UJA Federation's Professions Cabinet, is comprised of lawyers, accountants and, beginning this year, medical professionals, all of whom contribute a minimum gift of $3,600 to the annual UJA Federation campaign. Partners' Circle is chaired by Stephen Altbaum, Berl Nadler and Joseph Steiner.

The Professions Cabinet has raised close to $8 million towards UJA Federation Campaign 2006, which is expected to reach a final total of $58 million.

David Makovsky

"The dinner was the culmination of the Partners' Circle speakers' series which brought out a number of experts who provided us with behind the scenes information," said Beverly Lyons, who along with Fred Myers, chairs the UJA Federation Lawyers and Accountants Division. "It was very gratifying to see more than one hundred of our dedicated professionals enjoying the evening while learning from someone as knowledgeable as David Makovsky. His address was a real eye-opener."

According to Makovsky, the question surrounding Abbas' effectiveness is whether or not he will stick to his own conditions that he laid out when he came to office.

"These conditions included accepting all United Nation resolutions and that he would be responsible for all security services, something which he appears to be backing off on already," said Makovsky. "There is reason to be skeptical. There must be a determination at one point as to whether Abbas goes from being a counterweight for Hamas to a fig leaf."

"In the event that Abbas is ineffective, Israel will need to decide how it deals with him or at all. I don't expect any Israeli strategy towards Abbas to be formulated until after the Israeli elections," said Makovsky. "We are now between two elections, and this gives time to see how Abbas will relate to the new Hamas government. Once Abbas decides how he relates to Hamas, a new Israeli government will need to fashion a strategy about how it relates to him."

Israel's Olympic gold medal winner coming to Toronto

If you're suffering from Olympic withdrawal, take heart. Gal Fridman is coming to town.

The Hadera-born windsurfer made history in 2004 when he became Israel's first Olympic gold medalist. "To win their first Olympic gold was very exciting," says Fridman. To this day he thinks of standing on the podium in Athens every time he hears Hatikvah.

Fridman is proud that his Olympic gold—won for the Mistral event—lets people see "the other side of Israel—not only the bad side that they see in the media."

Fridman will be in Toronto on Sunday, May 7 to participate in the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre (MNJCC) Sports Celebrity Benefit.

Gal Fridman will be in Toronto on May 7 for the Miles Nadal JCC Sports Celebrity Benefit.

The event, which will be held at Olympic Spirit Toronto, will allow attendees to see, feel, hear and touch the Olympics through interactive displays and virtual competitions. In addition to Fridman, the Sports Celebrity Benefit will feature celebrities such as Keith Pelley, president and CEO of the Toronto Argonauts, and Michael Landsberg of TSN's "Off the Record".

The fully catered event – co-chaired by MNJCC board members Harold Wolkin and Stephanie Steen - will also feature a live auction.

The funds raised at the Sports Celebrity Benefit will go towards expanding and building sport and educational programs offered by the Miles Nadal JCC to the downtown Toronto community.

"This is the major fundraising initiative for our facility," says Wolkin. "We have been able to partner with all of Toronto's major professional sports teams, who have become our sponsors and have made a commitment to assist us in raising the funds necessary to continue providing the services and programming to our members and the broader downtown community."

And Fridman knows a thing or two about community. Once a week he bikes with at-risk kids through the Joint Distribution Committee—a program that he initiated and built. "I like to work with kids," he says. He is very conscious of the effect that a man in his position can have. "I know that everybody's watching, and I try to be a good role model. It's quite a responsibility that you cannot do things other people can do."

Fridman began windsurfing at age 7. By 12 he began training seriously. In 1996 he won a bronze medal at the Olympics, and was named Israel's Sportsman of the Year. Other career highlights include a bronze medal at the European Championships in 2001 and gold at the World Championships in 2002.

He is now beginning to train for the 2008 summer Olympics in Beijing. "I'm hoping that I can win and represent my country."

Fridman, who has visited Canada a few times in the past, wasn't surprised by the record number of medals Canada received at the recent Olympics in Torino. "Canada is known as a good place for winter sports," he says, noting that Israel's climate encourages summer sports like windsurfing instead.

Fridman knows that he's an inspiration not only for Israelis, but for Jews around the world. "It's a great feeling that I made so many people happy," he says. "That they're proud to be Israeli or Jewish."

Lebovic Jewish Campus will cater to the needs of community

New centre will keep pace with Vaughan's continued growth

By CARLA LANCIT
UJA Federation

When Jason and Aviva Fudem were looking for a new home for their expanding family, they wanted a certain type of community: a place with a neighbourhood feel, a place where their kids could make friends easily, a place with the services and facilities needed by a growing family. They chose a home in Thornhill Woods.

"This is a huge community within Thornhill," says Aviva Fudem. "Everybody has the same goal, because most of the people moving in are around the same age."

Almost two years later, they couldn't be happier with their decision. The one problem: Jewish communal services haven't kept pace with the growth of the flourishing community.

With a Jewish population of over 60,000, York Region is the third largest Jewish community in Canada—only Toronto and Montreal are home to more Jews. The region is also Canada's fastest growing Jewish community. The steady northward migration of the Jewish community, and the area's popularity with young families, have contributed to a growth rate of 13 per cent, which is expected to boost the community to 96,000 by 2016.

To help meet the needs of this flourishing Jewish community, UJA Federation—through its Tomorrow Campaign—is building the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus. The $150 million campus will be situated on 50 acres of land on Bathurst just north of Rutherford. The campus is being funded primarily by private donations.

The Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan will include a myriad of services and facilities catering to the needs of the flourishing community. Included on the new campus will be: (clockwise from top) two indoor swimming pools accessible to physically handicapped members, a Beit Midrash and a branch of CHAT (Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto) which will open its doors in time for the 2007 school year.

The Vaughan community is embracing the project. "We are looking forward to the building of the new Lebovic Campus in the City of Vaughan," says Mayor Michael Di Biase. "As well as providing a community centre with activities for all ages, the campus will house Hebrew day schools and many of the social services that are presently only available in Toronto. This expansion of services will benefit the Jewish community of our city."

The campus' first phase, expected to be completed by 2008/2009, includes the new Kimel Family Education Building, housing the northern branch of CHAT; The Schwartz Reisman Centre, with facilities for a wide variety of activities covering health and wellness, recreation, culture and social activities, among others; Reena; a Mount Sinai Hospital ambulatory clinic; early childhood education facilities, and multi-purpose rooms for meetings and functions serving predominantly campus agencies and schools.

The campus will serve the concrete needs of the community. The area, for instance, suffers from a shortage of childcare. The Lebovic Campus will include a childcare centre with 170 spaces.

"Daycare, preschool programming would be great," says Fudem. "If I think of my one-year-old daughter, Yael, it would be great to have a preschool to send her to. Now she's going to go to somebody's basement."

The Fudem's older daughter, Sarah, 3, takes dance classes at the public community centre. When the Lebovic Campus is built, though, Fudem says she'd rather take her there. "She would be surrounded by other Jewish kids from the neighbourhood. It would reinforce the community."

The Fudems are also happy that the campus will house a plethora of Jewish education options, including day schools, afternoon schools, and after-school programs. They are seriously considering Associated Hebrew School for their two daughters, but many of their friends in the neighbourhood are planning to send their children to afternoon school.

Reena, a non-profit social service agency dedicated to integrating individuals who have developmental disabilities into the mainstream of society, is an excellent example of how the Lebovic Campus will serve the community's needs. "In our centre currently we probably support 400 families," says Sandy Keshen, president and CEO of Reena. "Seventy-five per cent of them are from Vaughan. It will be incredibly convenient from them not to have to schlep."

In addition to serving concrete needs, the campus will also address the need for community. The Schwartz Riesman centre, in addition to providing a fitness centre, child care and after school programming, will be a point of community gathering—a place to hang out, a place to meet friends.

"We moved up here because we wanted to be around other families we're friends with—Jewish people with young kids," says Fudem. "That's the kind of community that's growing here."

"To put a Jewish campus of this magnitude near my house reinforces that it's going to stay this way."

Jews urged to push for Holocaust education in schools

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Who owns the legacy of Holocaust education? Mostly, it's Jews – including Holocaust survivors themselves, their children and grandchildren – and they haven't adequately exercised their clout to put it on school curricula.

Lesley Shore

At least that's the view of Prof. Lesley Shore of the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education of the University of Toronto (OISE), who addressed the topic in a recent talk sponsored by UJA Federation and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

Shore, an expert on the influence of Anne Frank as a Holocaust education tool for adolescents, said Jewish activists have not done enough to press for more or consistent instruction in this area in schools.

"Why have these same activists not championed the cause of Holocaust education in schools?" she asked. "It's important to teach your children. It's not enough to teach just your children."

Holocaust survivors, who numbered more than 23,000 in Canada according to the last census, "are a living legacy. Their reticence to talk is mirrored in education."

The Holocaust is not a mandatory part of Ontario's public school curricula, though teachers may teach it using books such as Anne Frank's Diary of a Young Girl.

Shore said more than 1,000 schoolchildren representing many different ethnic and religious origins viewed an exhibit on Anne Frank at OISE last year.

Holocaust education is not just a Jewish issue, "but a human issue."

But Shore took her own institution to task, saying OISE allowed a groundbreaking program on the Holocaust to languish.

Its diploma program in Holocaust and genocide education, funded by Toronto businessman Albert Latner, barely got off the ground a few years ago, because OISE "failed" to secure matching funds for it, Shore said.

It has graduated just 20 students to date, she said.

According to OISE's website, the program "is grounded in the contemplation of the educational value of multidisciplinary study of the Holocaust and is committed to the view that the study of the Holocaust must be related to the legal, moral and intellectual dimensions of other genocides."

The website notes, however, that "this program is currently being reviewed and will not be accepting applications until further notice."

Shore said the program died despite the presence of other Jewish staff at OISE.

"Where are my Jewish colleagues at OISE?" she asked.

She said the institute graduates 1,500 new teachers a year who learn "virtually nothing" about the Holocaust. "How can we expect teachers to teach it if they don't learn it?"

Graduate studies in the Holocaust elsewhere at the University of Toronto and other places of higher learning are not the same, she said, because they tend to turn out new professors and "have minimal impact on the real world," whereas the OISE program taught teachers how to teach the Holocaust to young people.

Shore expressed frustration, saying that since the 9/11 terrorist attacks, Canadian universities have made 40 teaching appointments in Middle East studies, an area now considered "hot."

She called on Jews to "advocate vigorously, unapologetically and tirelessly" to move Holocaust education in public schools and in teacher training "to the top of your agenda. If we don't take up the cause, how can we expect others to?"

Later, Shore told The CJN she doesn't understand "why my Jewish colleagues don't act. We can't keep this as a Jewish issue. It has to be for everyone. Why are we so hesitant to advocate publicly for it?"

U of T prof to pay homage to Pope John Paul II

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

A Toronto academic who has been invited to speak at a conference on Pope John Paul II at the United Nations on March 27 says he's glad to pay homage to "somebody who was so favourably disposed towards Jews and Judaism."

Rabbi David Novak, professor and former director of the University of Toronto's Jewish studies program, met the late pontiff in 1985.

"We have a notion of 'Hakarat hatov,'" he said. "We're supposed to recognize someone who has been good to us and for us, so I'm happy to be there. I think I'm the only Jewish speaker there."

The conference, "John Paul II: Contributions to Modern Thought on Social Justice and Peace," is being offered under the patronage of the Prince and Princess of Lichtenstein, and will be opened by UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan. Other speakers include former U.S. national security adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski, former Polish president Lech Walesa, and Canadian political philosopher Charles Taylor.

Rabbi Novak was born in Chicago and studied at the University of Chicago and the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York. He received a Ph.D. in philosophy from Georgetown University in Washington, D.C.

For 23 years, he was a congregational rabbi holding several pulpits, including one in Far Rockaway, Queens, N.Y. He taught at the University of Virginia prior to coming to the University of Toronto in 1997. He has since become a Canadian citizen.

"My wife and I like it here very much. We've especially enjoyed the Jewish community," he said. "I [also] enjoy the fact that in Toronto there are really some fine talmudic scholars that I'm meeting with on a regular basis."

Rabbi Novak teaches a weekly course at Princeton University in New Jersey and is the founder and vice-president of a right-wing Conservative breakaway group, the Union for Traditional Judaism, which has a yeshiva in Teaneck, N.J.

He also teaches a long-running Talmud class in a private home in Toronto. He is scholar-in-residence at Shaarei Shalom Synagogue in Thornhill and a member of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation in the Glencairn-Bathurst neighbourhood.

He is the author of 13 books, including the newly released The Jewish Social Contract, published by Princeton University Press. Shaarei Shomayim is hosting a book launch next week.

The book is a study of how Jews have negotiated their status in host societies and countries of the Diaspora, from biblical times to the present.

"It's about how I, as a Jew, can be a full participating citizen of a secular democracy in good faith, without regarding my participation in that secular democracy as being more important than my commitment to the Jewish people and the Jewish tradition," Rabbi Novak said.

He's planning to speak at the book launch, at the Shaarei Shomayim, 470 Glencairn Ave. at Bathurst, Sunday March 19, at 9:30 a.m. (after morning prayers). Admission is free for members, $5 for non-members.

Kingston board OKs Three Wishes

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Following a review by a committee of educators, a Kingston-area school board has decided not to remove a controversial book about the Palestinian-Israeli conflict from a prestigious reading program.

The Limestone District School Board has decided Three Wishes: Palestinian and Israeli Children Speak, will continue to be available to children in grades 4, 5 and 6 as part of the Ontario Library Association's Silver Birch recreational reading program.

The book had been removed from school library shelves pending the review.

"The review has been completed, and the result is that the committee felt that it agreed with the Ontario Library Association [OLA] that Three Wishes is appropriate for the Silver Birch" program, said Pat Warren-Chaplin, superintendent of instruction.

Warren-Chaplin, a member of the review committee, which included another superintendent, a school principal and human rights experts, said the book raises sensitive issues. As a result, teachers who dispense the book will be required "to read it first before students, to provide context and an introduction.

"We felt it was important that teachers put it in context so children could move forward with it," she said.

Three Wishes, by anti-war author Deborah Ellis, consists of interviews with children who discuss their lives and name three things they would wish for. Ellis provides an historical introduction before each child's story. Concern over the book was first raised by Toronto-area teachers and later by Canadian Jewish Congress, who argued the book is not appropriate for children aged nine to 11. They say it demonizes the Israeli army and suggests suicide bombing is a legitimate recourse for Palestinian youths.

The York Region school board removed the book from the Silver Birch program, but the Toronto District School Board decided to permit children in Grade 6 to read it, while requiring kids in grades 4 and 5 to present a note from their parents in order to do so.

School boards in Ottawa, Niagara Region and Windsor have also limited access to the book for children in younger grades.

The book is one of 10 non-fiction nominees chosen by the OLA as part of the Silver Birch program. The books are not part of school curricula, but are available for after-school recreational reading. At the end of the school year, children vote on their favourite book.

Warren-Chaplin said even before the controversy, Three Wishes "was a fairly popular book."

What's true versus what feels true

By RABBI MICHAL SHEKEL

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

"Seeing is believing" may be a cliché, but in the modern world, perception is truth.

Take, for example, the film Munich. It contains a great deal of archival news footage and depicts historical figures that are still fresh in our memories. However, many viewers don't stop to think how these people are merely used as elements to enhance a story, a fictionalized account. The average moviegoer does not consider Steven Spielberg's warning that this film is not a documentary but "historical fiction."

Too often this is our experience with various media. Perception becomes truth: if it feels true, it must be true. We do not differentiate between fiction and reality. We have even created an oxymoronic category known as the "docudrama." What is real or fiction doesn't matter, as long as it feels true.

How else can we explain the continued popularity of James Frey's A Million Little Pieces? It's touted as a memoir, but the author has reluctantly acknowledged that sections of the book have been embellished to make it a better read. And it's working! This book is currently at the top of the best-seller list in Canada. It doesn't have to be true to inspire– it only needs to feel true.

Feeling true as opposed to being true is an ancient problem, as we see in this week's parshah, Ki Tisa. Previously, in the book of Shmot, we experienced God in a dramatic fashion: God has taken us out of Egypt with a mighty hand and an outstretched arm; God has given us the Torah as we stood at Sinai; and God has given us detailed instructions on how to construct a tabernacle so that the Divine Presence may dwell in our midst.

Yet, in this week's parshah, Moses is on the mountain too long. God is absent, and things just don't feel right to the people. We demand a deity that we can comfortably perceive, hence the people construct a golden calf. It feels comfortable, it feels right, hence it must be true.

As Moses descends the mountain, he hears the cry of the people celebrating around the idol: "It is not the sound of the tune of triumph, or the sound of the tune of defeat; it is the sound of song that I hear!" (Exodus, 32:18)

What is important to us is not that we are right or wrong, but that we are comfortable. It was true for our ancestors who danced around the calf they made, and it's true for us who are easily seduced by the tantalizing images that pass for truth in contemporary life.

Our ancestors learned in dramatic fashion that just because you are comfortable with a perception does not make it true.

It's a lesson we must relearn constantly.

The 'mitzvah' in bat/bar mitzvah

By RABBI
REUVEN TRADBURKS

Guest voice

I think the "mitzvah" is really starting to get back into the bat/bar mitzvah.

Now, I need no convincing that the bar has been winning. The conspicuous consumption of our bat and bar mitzvah parties is not something to be proud of.

But I think the mitzvah is catching up. And we should be proud of that.

I am only speaking anecdotally. I am not a social scientist – I haven't done any studies as to how much mitzvah and how much bar. I am only speaking from my own perspective. But it seems to me that a lot of young people, with their parents' help, are wanting to emphasize the right things in their celebrations.

In particular, I am proud of what I see has become the "in" thing to give tzedakah as part of the bat or bar mitzvah. Kids get a lot of gifts – how many pens can you use? Or maybe now it is iPods. There is nothing wrong with getting gifts, and enjoying them. But when a young person makes a donation to a tzedakah at their bat mitzvah, it is a life-transforming moment. For a young person to donate $500 or $180 or $1,000 – that is something you remember the rest of your life.

'When we have good trends, and good copy-catting, ... we have every right to be proud'

I think this trend, and I believe it is a trend, to give tzedakah is one of those proud developments in our Jewish world. As parents and educators have wanted to reclaim these celebrations and to infuse meaning into them, a whole subculture of bar and bat mitzvah programs has sprung up – in the day schools, Hebrew schools and based in synagogues – all different types of programs. Through the programs different types of mitzvahs are working their way into the bat mitzvah year, but at the head of the list is tzedakah. Some programs are emphasizing chesed and I am proud of that. Some emphasize some Torah learning – that is great.

'Tzedakah has become the universal mitzvah'

But tzedakah has become the universal mitzvah that all these programs whether Orthodox, Reform, Conservative, unaffiliated, boys or girls – emphasize.

I had this little dream – and, truthfully, didn't really do anything about it until this year. This dream was to get young Jewish people from all walks of our city together to sing and dance and do a mitzvah. Now, I got this idea from the thrill I get every Yom Ha'atzmaut to see hundreds of young people dancing to the Moshav Band in Earl Bales Park. It brings tears to my eyes because it is happy, singing, smiling, energy, Jewish, and it includes all types of kids. That is a dreamy thing: happy Jewish.

So, how could we have happy Jewish focused around another mitzvah? Due to my involvement in the Koby Mandell Foundation and the sense that bar and bat mitzvah tzedakah has become as close to a universally held mitzvah as any for young people, we decided to have a city-wide concert with Shlock Rock for all bar and bat mitzvah kids.

The concert was great: a few hundred kids and parents, lots of energy, happy and focused on a mitzvah – donating to Camp Koby. It fit great for the kids because Koby, alav hashalom, was just past his bar mitzvah when he was brutally murdered. And I feel that Camp Koby is one of those line-crossing tzedakahs it is Israel; it helps kids who have lost family members to terror and that crosses all lines; it helps young people, which also brings out universal feelings; and for our bar and bat mitzvah kids, it is a bar mitzvah-aged boy whose memory is being perpetuated.

There is plenty of social criticism we can level at our Jewish world. But when we have good trends, and good copy-catting, and when a mitzvah takes off as tzedakah has, we have every right to be proud. I am proud of the educators, the parents, and especially the kids, who are getting the mitzvah back into their bat and bar. And I hope this trend, with the help of the educators and the parents, will become truly a universal aspect of every bat and bar mitzvah.

Jewish Life

The day after Purim

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

The celebrations of Purim have come and gone, and once again we return to the regular routines of living in Canada as Canadians and as Jews.

The many themes of Purim resound with us in the modern world. They're both entertaining and timeless. The ongoing parties, the political intrigue, assassination plots and contests of beauty are all elements of society that echo from the ancient world and touch on issues of today.

With the threat of annihilation at the doorstep of every Jew in ancient Persia, Mordechai and Esther write a letter that they send through time. They record their story and they command every Jewish community to read the tale, every word of it, in each and every generation for all time. There are even some Jewish commentators who insist that reading the Megillah and celebrating Purim will extend even into the messianic era.

But Mordechai and Esther do not only present us with the dilemmas of Jewish history and racism on a grand scale. The Megillah and their message detail the solution and not just the problem. According to Mordechai and Esther, every community is commanded to celebrate this festival by sending presents to the poor and treats to each other. It seems so frivolous and somewhat reminiscent of the ongoing parties that weave through the Megillah, yet their solution is timeless.

While facing war, hatred, assimilation and all of the other topsy-turvy threats that Purim embodies, Mordechai and Esther have told all future Jews that the answer to everything is to strengthen the community. By sending presents to the poor and treats to each other, we are all forced to head out into our communities to ensure that the needy are attended to and that connections are made and maintained between each of us.

Whatever challenges await us in the outside culture, a weakened community will only strengthen those challenges. We understood this message quite well as we prepared ourselves for Purim, and we rushed around on the day of Purim to deliver all of our treats to each other.

Yet, what happens the day after Purim?

The teaching, or perhaps the warning, to maintain a strong community is echoed through rabbinic literature. The tension that exists between personal fulfilment and the needs of the community is ever-present in text and in each of our lives. And yet, the rabbis warn us not to separate ourselves from the community, regardless of how frustrating it can become.

There is a talmudic teaching that points out that when the priests are blessing the people, they are facing the people. This subtle detail places the priests with their faces to the people and their backs to God, that is the degree to which the community is to be respected and strengthened.

At times when our community can become so divided over questions of leniency or strictness in ritual or expression, it's important to remember that the lessons of Purim are equally relevant on the day after the holiday.

Israeli elections, Part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

As Israelis prepare to vote on March 28, they'll be sizing up hundreds of candidates for Knesset, scrutinizing the candidates for prime minister and clicking through dozens of political websites.

Even if you don't have a vote, you can follow developments in this crucial election.

Although it feels like it happened long ago, it was only November when Amir Peretz, the new leader of the Israel's Labor party, withdrew from Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's coalition government, setting in motion elections for March. Shortly after that, Sharon changed the political landscape when he declared he would be leaving Likud to create the new Kadima party. And then Sharon's hemorrhagic stroke in January left him off the candidate list of the party that he had just founded. Wikipedia, the online encyclopedia, has a concise summary of the events of the last few months. The page also includes regularly updated information about the country's most recent opinion polls. [http://tinyurl.com/flbyw]

Of course, these crucial elections are not escaping the scrutiny of world media. But if you would like to follow local issues from an Israeli perspective, there are plenty of opportunities on the web. Ha'aretz's election section has many feature articles, political cartoons and several blogs. [http://tinyurl.com/r9363] Also check out the English site of Yediot Achronot, the country's best-selling newspaper. [www.ynetnews.com/]

The Jerusalem Post's Election 2006 section also has the backgrounders you'd expect about the parties and the candidates. But I enjoyed some of the other features, including the the political bumper stickers and these quotes from the campaign trail:

- "Labor's Knesset slate is a list of 'gefilte fish.'" – Shas chair Eli Yishai complaining that Labor's list comprises mainly Ashkenazi candidates.
- "They want us to go to the 'chupah' without a 'ketubah.'" – National Religious Party chair Zevulun Orlev commenting on coalition negotiations with the National Union.
- "We would be happy to supply him with towels to wipe off his sweat." – Kadima adviser Lior Horev on Benjamin Netanyahu's tendency to perspire.
- "Amir is already able to construct sentences on his own." – Amir Peretz's English teacher reporting on the progress of his famous student. [http://tinyurl.com/fr8l9]

Kol Yisrael, the Voice of Israel, provides live streaming of the Hebrew Reshet Bet radio network [http://tinyurl.com/bofrl], as well as daily English language newscasts. [http://tinyurl.com/rcrx6] Or you can watch daily TV coverage in English from the Israel Broadcasting Authority. [http://tinyurl.com/qkd85]

According to the Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Israeli law does not provide for absentee ballots. Voting takes place only on Israeli soil, except for Israelis serving aboard Israeli ships and working in Israeli embassies and consulates. [http://tinyurl.com/9fxj8] But that isn't stopping thousands of people from voting at dozens of colleges abroad. They'll be "voting" in mock elections organized by Israel Votes 2006. The project wants to drive home how Israel's political process works and has put together a comprehensive website. [www.iraelvotes2006.com]

All three prominent candidates for prime minister provide background in English on their sites: Likud leader and former prime minister Netanyahu [www.netanyahu.org/], Labor's Peretz [http://tinyurl.com/ehbty] and acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Kadima. [http://tinyurl.com/fty9z]

And what about the footsteps that one of these candidates will have to walk in? Wikipedia's prime-minister-of-Israel page has background and links to biographies of all of Israel's PMs. [http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/ Prime_Minister_of_Israel]. Study well. Because when you're done, you can test your knowledge at the Israeli prime ministers game. [http://tinyurl.com/rwqha] Match up a historical fact while clicking on the picture of a prime minister and the computer will tell you in a perfect Hebrew accent whether your choice is nachon (correct) or lo nachon (incorrect.)

Ryerson image arts students mount new media exhibition

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Fuse, the 2006 New Media Festival at Ryerson University's School of Image Arts, celebrates the work of the graduating class of the new media department this month.

While the image arts students put together an exhibit each year in order to graduate, this is the first time it will be open to the public.

"I'm very excited about the show. This is new for all of us," said Malka Greene, 30, in her fourth and final year studying image arts at Ryerson and the project manager of Fuse.

"We're hoping this will become an annual event."

Greene said that there is no particular theme to the exhibit, in which 30 students show a range of projects – installations, photography, performance work, animation and web design.

In the arts, the term "new media" refers to works that use multimedia, computers or communications technologies in creative expression. New media also involves interactivity and experience, said Greene, who is one of five students on the curatorial team.

"It's how you engage people on the other end of the computer."

Schwartzman's project, titled "Self Sufficient Sustainability," involves the proper equipment needed to "live a simple, low-energy, ultra-light, independent lifestyle that can easily fit on one's back," he said.

For the physical part of his installation, he taught himself how to sew so he could make his own lightweight backpacking gear and his own clothing, and he even began dehydrating food.

The virtual aspect of his project includes a website.

"On the website, which I called Make It Eco, people can make and share their sustainable lifestyle, sustainable being – anything that is eco friendly," Schwartzman said.

"If you're a climber, a hiker, a biker, or if you just like walking around the city instead of driving everywhere, you can come on the site, share your travels and learn to make your own gear instead of having to buy it."

He said that this approach can help people have fun doing something good for the environment.

"Doing this with an environmental message is not easy because most people are not willing to take action. What I'm trying to do is take it one step at a time and give people a way to make a small change in their lifestyle that will bring about a larger change."

While the projects will be spread out on the four floors of the image arts building on Bond Street in downtown Toronto, Schwartzman plans to present his installation by camping out in front of the building.

Other projects include one by Gabriel Kastner who created an animated series called "Details," which is "an interactive series of works predicated by a hypothesis: that we lead rich, full lives when we pay attention to the minute details – however small or mundane – of our surroundings, people we come across and items we encounter."

Ahmed El-Khuffash created an online photoblog "designed to create a community of Torontonians and unveil the beauty within their city."

The opening reception will be held on March 23 from 5 to 8 p.m. at the School of Image Arts and the exhibition will run on the 24th and 25th from noon to 5 p.m. Admission is free.

Complaints pending over Israeli Apartheid Week

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

It's been more than a month since Israeli Apartheid Week was held at the University of Toronto, but the controversy over the event is far from over, as both Hillel and Betar-Tagar say they will be filing complaints about it with the university.

"We are investigating one lecture in particular," said Tilly Shames, Israel affairs director of Hillel of Greater Toronto.

While she wouldn't share details of Hillel's complaint, so as not to hinder the investigation, she said Hillel takes issue with the language used by a speaker at one of the Israeli Apartheid Week lectures.

Jonathan Jaffit, director of campus affairs with Betar-Tagar, a Zionist student group, and one of the organizers of Know Radical-Islam Week – which took place prior to Israeli Apartheid Week in an attempt to counter it, and was itself controversial – said Betar-Tagar is also taking action against the Arab Students' Collective by filing a complaint about one of the lectures.

"Betar-Tagar is filing a formal grievance with U of T student affairs against the Arab Students' Collective for that week, which incited hatred against Jews and Israelis," Jaffit said.

"We are also taking it to the Toronto Police Services hate crimes unit with fully documented evidence."

He, too, didn't want to comment on specifics of the complaint before the university and police had a chance to formally address the issue.

Jim Delaney, assistant director of student affairs at U of T, said last week that Hillel and Betar-Tagar had yet to formally file complaints, but he said he has been in contact with both groups. "This is the time that people may be considering whether they are going to file a complaint, but at this point nothing is in writing," Delaney said.

"If we do get complaints, we'll determine whether they went against student policy. If they incited hate or violence, the complaint will be turned over to Toronto Police," he said, adding that he's heard complaints about both Israeli Apartheid Week and Know Radical-Islam Week.

Pekka Sinervo, dean of U of T's faculty of arts and science and chair of the Jewish studies program advisory committee, said that while some people were offended by the events, for the most part, both went unnoticed by the majority of U of T students.

"If you ask a typical student what they thought about the events, they'd say, 'What events?' These events weren't very in-your-face," Sinervo said.

"The number of students who participated was small. There were no marches, no protests, no rallies. It was low profile, except for the content. For the two groups, the intent was to create a profile."

Sinervo doesn't think such events do much to improve dialogue on campus. "It's not the most helpful dialogue on campus – it's not a dialogue at all. They've already made up their minds."

Such events only "preach to the choir," he added. "The lectures began from a polarized point of view. It was not meant to stir up informed debate. I don't think it helped people's fundamental understanding," he said.

"Was it disruptive? I don't think it had a big impact among students. Not to minimize them, but I don't think they were particularly effective."

But Shames said some people were upset by the polarization the two events created on campus. She said that after attending a recent student forum, she heard complaints from students about the events, and many came from Muslim students who were unhappy about both lecture series.

Shames said that after Know Radical-Islam Week and during Israeli Apartheid Week, The Strand, a U of T campus newspaper, printed a cartoon that portrayed Jesus "making out" with the Muslim Prophet Muhammad in the "Tunnel of Tolerance."

Shames said someone pasted the cartoon on the door of the Muslim Students' Association's room. "I feel for them. I'm sure they are feeling targeted. They were intentionally offended," she said. "If the situation was reversed, we'd be just as upset."

Native group rejects criticism of trip

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The chief of the Assembly of First Nations (AFN) is "completely unapologetic" about a recent visit to Israel that has drawn the ire of a collection of Arab groups, AFN communications director Don Kelly stated last week.

Chief Phil Fontaine's trip to Israel from Feb. 17 to 22, along with several First Nations leaders, was part of an educational and cultural exchange with the Jewish community, Kelly said.

Fontaine was invited by Canadian Jewish Congress, and "our interest is in building bridges, not in turning groups away," he said, adding it's "very telling that none of our regional groups or chiefs signed on to the letter."

The AFN's visit was criticized in an open letter published by the Vancouver-based Canada Palestine Association (CPA) and endorsed by an assortment of organizations, including the Al-Huda Muslim Society, the International Solidarity Movement, Palestine House, and Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights.

CPA said it's "saddened, hurt and shocked by the visit of a delegation of the AFN to Israel" as well as Fontaine's statement that noted the shared values of Israelis and Canadian indigenous people. The letter accuses Israel of colonialism, ethnic cleansing, genocide, apartheid, brutality and other crimes.

The AFN responded with a statement by Fontaine noting, "Israel and the First Nations share a common interest and goal in rebuilding from inflicted harms and commemorating catastrophic pasts. Israel's resiliency and determination were inspiring and hopeful."

The AFN statement stressed the benefit of the trip and said, "we hope we can return some of the hospitality and education we received from the Jewish community in the near future."

Memorial service recalls Ilan Halimi

By BARRY FISHMAN
Special to The CJN

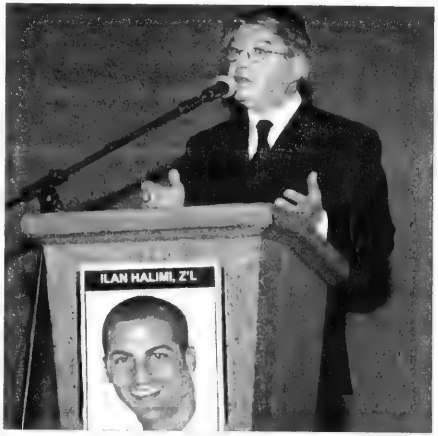
OTTAWA — It was a remarkable turnout for an event that was organized in little more than 72 hours.

Nearly 300 people attended a March 8 vigil at Ottawa's Soloway Jewish Community Centre (SJCC) in memory of Ilan Halimi, the young French Jew who was brutally tortured and murdered in a Paris suburb last month.

"Tonight we raise our voices with all those who manifest their outrage and their righteous anger in the deliberate torture and suffering inflicted to this young man," the vigil's lead organizer, Cantor Daniel Benlolo of Beth Shalom Synagogue, said in his opening remarks.

Speakers included Ron Prehogan, chair of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ronen-Gil-Or, deputy head of mission at the Israeli embassy, French Ambassador Daniel Jouanneau, and Andy Kusi-Appiah, senior policy adviser to Ottawa Mayor Bob Chiarelli.

Prehogan said the torture and murder of Halimi was an attack on all Jews.



French Ambassador Daniel Jouanneau addressing the gathering. [Peter Waiser photo]

"The Jewish community of Ottawa, in solidarity with our Jewish brothers and sisters the world over, pledges to continue to be front and centre in the fight against anti-Semitism, intolerance and hatred of all kinds, to sensitize the authorities and media whenever we can, to never be silent, to never stop doing everything we can to bring the perpetrators of hate crimes to justice," he said.

Holding the vigil shows the Halimi family and the Jews of France that they're not alone, Farber said.

"Your presence here tonight at this vigil of support and solidarity closes the distance between us and our brothers and sisters in France and all around the world. It provides courage to them, sending a crystal-clear message to them: You are not alone."

Jouanneau expressed his condolences to the Halimi family, thanked the organizers for the opportunity to address the Jewish community and emphatically noted the resolve of the French authorities and people to bring the perpetrators of this anti-Semitic crime to justice.

"The fight against anti-Semitism is an absolute priority for my country… Indeed anti-Semitism is a negation of our republican spirit. As President [Jacques] Chirac said, any attack against a Jew is an attack against the Republic."

The ambassador said that because of special measures the French government has put in place, anti-Semitic incidents fell by 47 per cent in 2005 compared to 2004.

"This is because everyone has been mobilized. But w still want to be more vigilant and new measures have been decided," he said.

They include better security at Jewish institutions and monitoring illegal behaviour on the Internet.

Gil-Or praised the French government for its efforts to fight anti-Semitism and bring the criminals to justice.

"This kind of brutality, like the sickening torturing and murder of Ilan, belongs to the – to the medieval Inquisition, to the Nazis and their collaborators, and the anti-Semitic pogroms against Jews," he said.

Speaking on behalf of Chiarelli, Kusi-Appiah condemned Halimi's murder.

"What makes it even more horrifying is the fact that there were people who knew what was going on and yet chose to turn a blind eye just because Ilan was Jewish," he noted.

The evening was organized by the Jewish Federation of Ottawa and SJCC in collaboration with the French and Israeli embassies of Israel and France.

Historic plaques placed on Hungarian shuls

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Some of the majestic former synagogues of Hungary have been recognized for their historic legacy because of the discreet efforts of a Montreal Holocaust survivor.

Until recently, the buildings were not identified as having once been houses of Jewish worship. Over the last two years, Paul Herczeg has seen large commemorative plaques affixed – at his personal expense – to 10 former synagogues across his native country.

The synagogues – most of which are tall, stately and capacious – are now mainly libraries or cultural centres. But, to Herczeg's chagrin, one is a furniture store and another is a television studio.

The plaques pay tribute to the fact that before 1944 – the year the Germans physically occupied Nazi-allied Hungary – the edifices served as a "place[s] of worship for the Jewish community.

"From here they proclaimed the glory of God," the plaques read, but then they "became silent. These walls are a reminder of the martyrdom of the victims."

The project has received wide media attention in Hungary, with plaque dedication ceremonies in the presence of Hungarian politicians who, Herczeg said, have eloquently borne witness to what Hungary lost with the murder of her Jews.

The Kecskemet synagogue was the first to receive a plaque, and then plaques were affixed to former synagogues in Buda, Kisvarda, Szolnok, Gyongos, Mateszalka, Szolnoki, Szekscard and Budapest. Ten more synagogues have been designated to receive future plaques when funding is available.

Until now, Herczeg, a 76-year-old retired retailer, preferred to remain quiet about his instrumental role in the project, to the point of requesting that his name not be put on the plaques, although it ultimately was.

The buildings' status as previous places of Jewish worship would almost certainly have continued to be unrecognized had it not been for Herczeg.

He got the idea for the plaques about five years ago, while making his annual trip to Hungary to see his sister, Erma, who is now deceased. While visiting Kecskemet, he noticed a small, almost imperceptible, Star of David in an upper window of a library some non-Jewish friends had brought him to visit.

"I thought to myself, 'This was a synagogue'" Herczeg said, "and it gave me an idea: why shouldn't there be plaques to let people know what was once here?"

It took several years, however, for Herczeg to actually achieve his goal.

In 2004, on his annual trip to Hungary, Herczeg visited a friend, Gabor Vero, of Hungary's Holocaust Documentation Centre and Memorial Association, and brought up the subject of identifying the former syngagogues with plaques.

Vero thought it was a "fantastic idea," Herczeg recalled.

He was then put in touch with the Hungarian-Jewish Association, which helped with the logistical end of things by acquiring the needed licensing and surmounting bureaucratic hurdles.

Financing was another matter. The Hungarian government had already invested substantially in the construction of the Budapest Holocaust Memorial Centre, opened in 2004, and Herczeg did not feel comfortable making personal solicitations for money, so he ultimately opted to pick up the costs of the plaques himself.

"I'm not one to seek the limelight," Herczeg said. "I didn't do it for the kovod (honours)."

He decided not to attend the dedications because of the emotional trauma they would engender. His eyes glisten when he speaks about what his family went through.

Herczeg was 15 years old, growing up in the Budapest suburb of Ujpest with his mother Regina, father Geza, sister Erma and brother Andrew, when the Germans arrived on March 19, 1944.

Forced labour had already begun five years earlier for Hungarian Jewish males between the ages of 18 and 50. Within a few months after the Germans' arrival, Ujpest's 10,000 Jews – out of a population of a total population of 100,000 – were deported.

Herczeg's mother was gassed upon arrival at Auschwitz-Birkenau. Herczeg and his father, 52, were sent to a notorious slave-labour camp in Germany, where his father succumbed to the effects of lugging bags of cement all day with almost no food. His sister survived Auschwitz and the war, as did his brother. Herczeg himself made it through in part by scrounging for potato peelings.

The plaque identifies former synagogue in Kecskemet, Hungary, left, as a place where Jews "proclaimed the glory of God."

"I had to survive in order to tell the story," he said. He tells the story often to students as a member of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre's speakers bureau.

The plaque project makes Herczeg smile when he thinks about the non-Jewish Hungarian population who have come to appreciate the great Jewish legacy that once existed in their own towns, and it makes him cry when he thinks about his lost parents and the other half-million Hungarian Jews who were murdered.

"There are sometimes tears in my eyes when I think about how this came about," he said. "It's just been beyond all expectations."

Cornwall shul closes its doors on an 80-year history

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

April 2 will be a sad day for the small and dwindling Jewish community of Cornwall, Ont., as that's when the town's only synagogue, the 80-year-old Beth-El Congregation, will close its doors for good.

Mark Goldhamer, 83, who has been president of the shul for 25 years, said the decision to close it was made last summer because it has so few members that getting a regular minyan together had become nearly impossible.

Cornwall has had a Jewish community since the 1860s, but in recent years, it declined drastically, as younger generations of Jews moved to bigger cities, Goldhamer said.

Information provided by Ellen Scheinberg, director of the Ontario Jewish Archives, shows Cornwall has a rich Jewish history that dates back to Alexander Vineberg, who settled in the eastern Ontario town in 1858.

The community grew from 15 Jews in 1881 to 210 by 1931.

Beth-El Congregation was established in 1925, and the cornerstone was laid by Aaron Horovitz, who later became the mayor of Cornwall in the 1950s.

Goldhamer said that at its peak in the mid-1950s, the shul had about 275 members, including people who lived in and around Cornwall.

But in the late 1960s, the number began to steadily decline.

"The last time we had regular weekly services was two years ago," he said.

Joyce Miller, 73, Goldhamer's sister-in-law, was once president of the Hadassah sisterhood in Cornwall. She said she was involved with every part of the shul, "including washing the floors."

She moved to Cornwall from Montreal in 1944, when the synagogue had a thriving congregation of about 90 families.

In the 1960s, "people were becoming elderly and the younger people began leaving. Families would move out of town. Of our four children, only one of them stayed in town. There was nothing for them here," Miller said.

"Today [the shul has] a main list of about 18 people. Very small. It's a terrible thing that happened," Goldhamer added.

"The older people who came here can't live forever and the younger people all moved away," he said.

Montreal-born Peter Loebel, who lived and worked in Cornwall for five years in the 1950s before moving to Toronto, is also upset at the loss of the shul.

"It's just sad, but this is part of the way that towns change," he said, adding that living in Cornwall and being a part of its Jewish community was an important part of his life.

Speaking about Cornwall's proud Jewish history, he noted that Nathan Phillips, the first Jewish mayor of Toronto, who served from 1955 to 1962, grew up in Cornwall.

"The younger generation moved away, and the older generation is living in nursing homes and dying. They are the ones who have kept [the shul] going."

In an attempt to help Cornwall's Jewish community stay active, other small Jewish communities in northern New York state – including Lake Placid, Malone, Massena, Ogdensburg, Potsdam and Tupper Lake – formed a coalition with Cornwall in August 1992 to share in joint activities.

Goldhamer said he can't be sure where the remaining 18 members will go for services once the shul closes, but he guessed they will probably join congregations in Ottawa and Montreal.

"We just can't keep up with the synagogue anymore. And it's not about the money. We just don't have the people. No young people have come back."

On April 2, Beth El will hold its final service. Goldhamer said he will give a speech and a rabbi will attend, as will representatives from Canadian Jewish Congress and United Israel Appeal-Federations Canada.

The 125-seat, one-floor shul has been sold and will be turned into a private home.

"On Rosh Hashanah, I broke down a couple times. It's very sad. The loss of the synagogue is a terrible blow to the city," Goldhamer said.

Miller said that in an effort to continue weekly Shabbat services, the shul began to count women in the 10 people needed to make up a minyan.

"Now, even when we count women, we don't have a minyan. We have people in their 90s, and we can't expect them to come here every Saturday morning.

"When you're down to less than 20 people, it's hard to keep a shul open for [even] three days a year," she said, explaining that the fewer members a shul has, the fewer donations it gets.

"For years we talked about [closing Beth-El], but we would say, 'We can't close. We can't close,' but the building began to deteriorate."

As Miller began discussing the final ceremony, she broke down into tears, apologizing for her emotional state.

"This is just very difficult," she said.

"It's a very sad thing. I just don't realize how emotional I am about it until I start talking about it. I feel like once the shul is gone, the community is gone."

Canadian survivors to get 'Gold Train' funds

By JANICE ARNOLD and RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporters

Needy Hungarian Jewish Holocaust survivors in this country may begin making claims on the nearly $1.5 million (Cdn) allotted to Canada in the Hungarian "Gold Train" settlement.

The funds will be paid out over five years to three Canadian Jewish agencies: UIA Federations Canada, the Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors (CJCS) in Montreal and Circle of Care in Toronto.

Canada received about six per cent of the historic $25.5 (US) class-action settlement finalized last autumn between Hungarian Holocaust survivors and the U.S. government.

Allocations to 27 Jewish social-service agencies in seven countries were announced in January.

Circle of Care in Toronto will receive $170,000 (Cdn.) a year, an amount expected to continue for the ensuing four year; about $105,000 a year will go to the CJCS in Montreal for five years; and Toronto-based UIA Federations Canada will distribute $17,600 annually over five years to "unfederated" small Jewish communities outside major urban centres.

The funds are intended for needy Hungarian survivors for emergency care and home services.

According to the 2001 national census, Hungarian Jewish Holocaust survivors numbered 1,455 in Toronto, 1,140 in Montreal, 95 each in Vancouver and Ottawa, 65 in Winnipeg, 20 each in Kitchener and Calgary, about 15 in Edmonton, and 10 in Hamilton.

How many of those are needy is unknown. But an extensive study by Jewish community planners in 2004 found that one-quarter of Canada's 23,000-plus Holocaust survivors were poor, that more than 3,000 were poor and lived alone, and that more than 10,000 had one or more disabilities.

The "Gold Train" settlement – $21.5 million (US) after legal fees and expenses – was approved in September by a judge in Florida, ending a lawsuit filed in 2001 by a group of survivors led by Irving Rosner.

The suit alleged that the Nazis and their Hungarian collaborators stole thousands of valuables – paintings, jewelry, stamps and coins, Oriental rugs, fine china and glassware, lace, silver and religious items – from Hungarian Jews and packed them onto 24 freight cars bound for Germany.

Shortly after the Allied victory in Europe in May 1945, the U.S. Army captured the train in Austria.

But survivors charged that the U.S. government never returned the valuables to the Hungarian victims or their heirs. Much of the property went missing. Some of it was requisitioned by officers to furnish their homes during the occupation of Austria, while some was apparently looted by American soldiers and civilian employees. The rest was eventually auctioned in New York.

After the lawsuit was launched, the United States denied any legal liability, but it did issue an apology. It agreed to pay into a fund that will benefit needy Hungarian Jewish victims of the Nazis now living throughout the world, rather than attempt to track down and directly compensate those who claim they were the owners of the lost property.

The New York-based Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, known as the Claims Conference, which is acting as steward, is disbursing the funds in accordance with the court-approved plan it developed. The initial disbursement was $4.2 million.

The money is being given to eligible survivors for "emergency assistance," such as food, shelter and health or home care, said CJCS spokesperson Benita Goldin.

The main criteria for eligibility are that a person be a Jew born before May 8, 1945 (not necessarily in Hungary) and have lived within the 1944 borders of greater Hungary some time between 1939 and 1945, and be in financial need.

The gross annual income of an individual must be below $22,540, or $30,360 for a couple, and assets should not exceed $23,000 for a single person, or $34,500 for a couple (excluding primary residence and a car.)

The maximum amount a person can receive in the current calendar year is $2,900.

Some examples of possible claims for funds include medical or dental care not covered by the government; prescription drugs; and rent to prevent eviction or utility payment if threatened with being cut off. Also considered will be home care, including heavy housecleaning, respite for caregivers, home repair and transportation.

In Montreal, allocations won't be paid directly to beneficiaries, but by the CJCS to service providers, Goldin noted.

The CJCS is also offering its case-management services to people eligible for benefits. It has a Hungarian speaker on staff.

As part of the settlement terms, the CJCS is setting up an advisory committee composed of Hungarian survivors to help oversee the implementation of the program, Goldin said.

"An intake professional will review the survivor's eligibility and work together with him or her to determine how the funds can best be used to meet the survivor's needs," she added. The CJCS has a list of cities and towns that were within Hungary's borders in 1944.

The same is true at Circle of Care in Toronto, where about $90,000 a year will go toward ongoing services for Hungarian survivors, including homemaking, home and respite care, and transportation, and $55,000 will be allocated annually for emergency services, including wheelchairs, dentures, hearing aids and rent.

Executive director Arnold Foss said recipients will have to provide tax returns and other documents attesting to income, but he said the agency plans to be "flexible and human."

He said that as a result of the new money, he expects the agency to begin serving another 100 or so Hungarian survivors, in addition to the 50 it serves now.

A lay committee has been struck in Toronto to help disburse the funds. It is headed by local Holocaust survivor and educator Judy Cohen.

In addition to providing for survivors' welfare, the U.S. government has earmarked another $500,000 to create an archive of documents and materials relating to the Hungarian Gold Train events and the fate of the Hungarian Jewish community in general. It will be available for scholarly research and educational purpose.

Survivors who think they may be eligible should contact the CJCS intake department at 514-342-1234, Circle of Care at 416-635-2860 or UIA Federations Canada at 416-636-7655.

Sosumi sets new standard for sushi at Gladstone's

You don't just like sushi, you love it. But you'd like to enjoy it in the same ambience you've come to associate with other culinary experiences and special occasions, among friends and acquaintances. In your neighbourhood — not halfway across town.

Now you can.

It was only a matter of time before Raphy Amar addressed the growing demand for sushi among his discerning clientele by introducing it at Gladstone's Wine Bar & Grill. But incorporating sushi the Gladstone's way was not a matter of days or weeks. Amar and general manager Gino Falcitelli devoted months to the process of planning and tweaking the kind of elaborate menu that would satisfy even the most demanding sushi connoisseur, in cooperation with a distinguished chef capable of doing it full justice.

"Everything we've done here to date has been consistent with world-class standards," says Amar. "The same applies to Sushi. Simply adding it to the menu would not have been acceptable. We needed to create our own little restaurant-within-a-restaurant — not just another sushi bar. If you're not going to go all out, why bother? Sosumi is now an important part of the Gladstone's dining experience."

This ambitious approach and uncompromising modus operandi have served Amar well at Gladstone's, and Sosumi and its sushi afficionados are clearly the culinary beneficiaries.

The name "Sosumi" is shrouded in myth and legend, but the Gladstone's version of Sosumi is quickly building its own legend — for exquisite taste and presentation. Sosumi's variety is spectacular, from à la carte to combination platters to maki and handrolls. Try the Matsu Maki, a succulent combination of fresh tuna sashimi, diced tomatoes, avocado chunks and masago, tossed in a light special sauce and scattered over Gladstone's classic California rolls. Or the Sakura Sushi — a delectable combination of tuna, salmon, tai, hamachi, pepper-seared tuna, butter fish, egg, pepper-seared albacore, salmon roe, spicy tuna roll and handroll ... just two of dozens of tantalizing specialties.

But the Sosumi sensation at Gladstone's goes far beyond daily dining. Planning a catered event? Give the festivities a Japanese flair and treat your guests to the kind of exotic dining experience and dramatic presentation that only Gladstone's can deliver. Sosumi Sushi catering packages are available for virtually any size of group. For smaller gatherings in your home or office, Sosumi's Maki and Sushi platters will satisfy the most discerning of palates. Of course, even a simple take-out order for two receives Gladstone's trademark attention to detail.

Gladstone's world-class international cuisine, wine list, beverage menu, and dessert selection dovetail naturally with Amar's ongoing catering activities through Beverly Hills Caterers. "It's a privilege to be able to serve others, both on a daily basis and for the milestone events in their lives," says Amar. The process of spending long hours meeting with customers to determine their needs and develop menus that resonate with their palate only adds to the pleasure, he says. "When you love what you do, it isn't really work ... it's pleasure. You're always in the moment."

After 43 years in Canada, grandmother still keeps Moroccan Pesach traditions

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

After 43 years in Canada, Marcelle Benaim, born in Portugal but brought up in Casablanca, Morocco, still follows Sephardi Passover customs.

"It's my heritage and I don't want to lose it. My seders now are almost identical to the ones [I attended] growing up.

"The one major difference, though, is that I make matzah balls. My nine grandchildren insist upon them."

She recalls, as a child, cleaning the house "like crazy" for Passover, and giving the kitchen a fresh coat of paint every year.

"It is a spring festival, so we did our spring cleaning and made new spring dresses for the seder. The weather was beautiful during Passover and we always went to the beach."

Their life wasn't easy, she says, because her mother died when she was seven, and she was brought up by her grandmother and her older brothers.

"Our festivals were joyous, though. We sang Sephardi melodies and we had lots of kidding around. It was a good time then, in Morocco. There was little anti-Semitism."

Her daughter Esther, a cook and co-owner of the culinary centre Great Cooks on Eight, says her own kids love the Sephardi tradition. "My mother has made them feel Moroccan, and they insist on keeping up the customs."

Marcelle Benaim says the seder service is similar to an Ashkenazi service, "but the food is a world apart. Our charoset is made of dates, walnuts, raisins, wine and cinnamon.

"We usually start with a fish appetizer, but instead of gefilte fish, we form balls and bake them in a tagine with tomatoes, peppers, garlic, coriander and paprika.

"Then we serve an assortment of salads such as carrot, green and red pepper, eggplant or tomato. During the year, we mop these salads up with bread, but during Passover, we do the best we can with matzah."

She says the soup to which her grandchildren add their matzah balls is "always made with fresh fava beans, white onion, celery, coriander and potatoes. It's a very traditional soup and we don't change it. It's expected."

The main course is usually chicken with almonds, prunes and "lots and lots" of onions, Benaim says. "Moroccan food is comfortable and intricately flavoured. We do a fair amount of mixing fruits with meats and chicken."

Dessert, she says, is a ritual. "We never bake. We serve dried fruits and unshelled nuts and we sit around cracking open the nuts and taking handfuls of fruit.

"We also make 'sandwiches' out of dates and walnuts and hand them around."

A favourite mid-week treat, she says, is a piece of matzah dipped in milk and sugar, and then heated. "We also make it in order to use up the last bits of matzah."

What she still misses from her childhood, she says, is Mimouna, the festival held on the last day of Passover. "I remember heaping tables of food, including wine and special jams made with orange, carrot or eggplant. Some people made crepes of honey and butter, and some made pasta and milk.

"Every house set up a table and we would go from house to house. As we entered, we were given a piece of lettuce dipped in honey to signify a sweet year.

"That's not the same anymore. People live too far away from each other, and people are busy. They don't take the time to spend a whole evening."

MARCELLE'S PASSOVER SOUP

1 small chicken or 2 large beef bones with marrow
1 celery heart, chopped
2 lb. green fava beans in pods either fresh or frozen – peeled
2 large white onions- chopped
3 large potatoes – cubed
1 bunch fresh coriander
salt and pepper to taste
a few threads of saffron or ½ tsp. turmeric

Place all ingredients in a large pot with enough water to cover. Bring to the boil, then turn heat down to simmer. Cook covered for about 1-1½ hours till all ingredients are cooked through. Remove chicken or bones and puree soup to a chunky consistency, not too fine.

If the soup seems too thick, add a bit of hot water. Bring to boil again and then simmer for about 15 minutes. Serve with soup nuts or matzah. Serves 6.

TANGINE OF CHICKEN WITH ONIONS AND RAISINS

1 medium chicken cut in pieces
3 large white onions, sliced
½ tsp. saffron mixed in ½ cup water
½ cup raisins vegetable oil
salt to taste

In a medium size pot, sauté the sliced onions in oil till golden. Add the chicken pieces and season with salt. Cook uncovered till chicken turns golden. Cover and let simmer for 15 minutes.

Meanwhile, soak raisins in cold water for 5-10 minutes. Add raisins and saffron to chicken and onions. Simmer either in a 350-degree oven or on stovetop for another 20 minutes or until chicken is fully cooked. If needed, add a bit of hot water. Serve hot.

Gourmet dinner raises funds for trees in Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

In celebration of Tu b'Shvat, Ariel Porat, executive chef of Dan Accadia Hotel in Herzliya, in co-operation with chef Alex Austriaco of the Windsor Arms Hotel in Toronto, recently prepared a five-course gourmet dinner for a capacity crowd of more than 200 people at the Windsor Arms.

The dinner, held as the culmination of Jewish National Fund of Canada's celebration of the holiday, was sponsored by JNF Canada, in co-operation with the two hotels, the Consulate General of Israel and El Al Israel Airlines.

Ben Prossin, executive director of JNF Toronto, says funds raised for the dinner are earmarked to plant olive trees in Israel.

"Olive trees, which were the focus of this year's Tu b'Shvat campaign, are a symbol of growth, ancient times, Jewish settlement and peace with Israel's neighbours," he said.

"Tu b'Shvat is a major [JNF] celebration each year, but this is the first time we've had a dinner. It's a different kind of JNF event, and we'd like to make it an annual affair."

Dinner guests feasted upon such gourmet dishes as Jerusalem artichoke soup with shitake mushrooms, halibut encrusted in kadaif pastry with roasted tomatoes and fennel coulis, grilled lamb patty with trio tahini sauce, baked chicken supreme stuffed with apricot compote served on a bed of saffron Israeli couscous and pomegranate, and for dessert, halvah parfait with marinated berries.

The intermezzo between the lamb patty and the chicken was passion fruit sorbet with rose water.

Porat supplied the following recipes:

LAMB PATTIES WITH 3-COLOURED TAHINI

100 ml tahini paste
150-200 ml very cold water juice of one big lemon
salt to taste
1 small beet, grated
1 tsp. turmeric + 1 tsp. yellow curry powder
1 bunch parsley leaves

Mix the paste with water until there are no lumps. Add salt and lemon juice. Divide tahini into three parts and mix each part with a different flavour (one with beet, one with turmeric and curry, one with parsley). Let marinate in fridge for 12 hours.

LAMB PATTIES

1 kg fresh minced lamb meat
1 big bunch of mint chopped
1 big bunch of parsley chopped
150 gm pine nuts (lightly roasted)
1 large onion finely chopped
4 garlic cloves minced
½ tsp. each of black pepper, cinnamon, nutmeg, English pepper (amounts may change according to personal taste)

Mix all ingredients and place in fridge for 6 hours. Divide into small patties and grill. Serve on plate with three-coloured tahini sauces.

Israel's Iran policy a 'delicate balance'

By DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — In handling Iran, Israel has long combined tough rhetoric with tactical reticence.

Motivating this delicate counterpoint was the need to prompt international action against Iran's nuclear program and, simultaneously, nourish the idea Israel could strike first in self defence, all the while avoiding sabre-rattling.

Some say remarks made last week by a retired Israeli general upset this delicate balance, ahead of the UN Security Council's discussing possible sanctions against the Islamic republic this week. Israeli officials consider these talks the triumphant culmination of years of quiet lobbying in Washington and European capitals.

"In the end, we want to cause the international community to prevent the Iranians from developing non-conventional capabilities," interim Prime Minister Ehud Olmert told Israel Radio.

But there are no promises of a quick resolution, and with some experts asserting that Iran is just months away from having the ability to produce nuclear weapons, Israel is not ruling out a military last resort.

The problem is the Osirak attack. In 1981, Israel bombed Iraq's main reactor. That preemptive move, while depriving Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein of the bomb, also deprived Israel of the element of surprise in any similar actions against Iran.

"We have an excellent military, but in this sort of conflict, originality of thought in planning is the top priority," said a senior Israeli security source. "It is also a major challenge, given that the world is watching the space between Tel Aviv and Tehran so closely."

Moshe Ya'alon, the former chief of Israel's armed forces, unwittingly provided a gauge for the depths of jitters in Jerusalem.

The retired lieutenant-general was quoted as telling a Washington, D.C., think tank, the Hudson Institute, last week that Israel, with the help of American and European air forces, could feasibly attack Iranian nuclear sites.

The remarks set off a political firestorm in Israel, with Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz accusing Ya'alon of rashly speaking out of turn.

Ya'alon responded that he didn't give away operational secrets, and he accused political rivals of using him as a scapegoat ahead of the March 28 election.

"I don't understand the uproar in Israel," Ya'alon told Israel's Channel 1 TV on Friday. "Nothing from what I said should harm Israel's national security." He noted that he didn't emphasize Israel's role in a possible attack and that he stressed that it could be a joint effort with NATO and the United States.

Ya'alon's military career was curtailed last year by Mofaz, a senior member of the ruling Kadima Party, and Ya'alon is widely assumed to be close to the rival Likud.

"I will not allow anyone to co-opt me for their cause," Ya'alon told Army Radio Sunday.

According to one military analyst, Ya'alon may have ruffled feathers in Israel not by revealing secrets, but by revealing limitations.

Rather than giving a perfect prognosis in his speech, he said that an attack would at best retard the Iranian nuclear program, rather than destroy it. He also said Iran was likely to retaliate with missile fire or by ordering its Lebanese proxy Hezbollah to step up violence against Israel.

"His remarks, ironically, show to what extent Israel lacks an aggressive option against Iran," Ofer Shelach wrote in Yediot Achronot.

"If, as Ya'alon put it, what is needed is a protracted aerial assault against dozens of targets inside Iran, along with a capability for real-time intelligence, it is clear that the situation is far different from the smashing single blow delivered against the Iraqi reactor in 1981."

Former Shin Bet head and Kadima MK candidate Avi Dichter came to Ya'alon's defence on Saturday.

Dichter told Israel Radio that while he might have chosen to refrain from making certain statements that Ya'alon made, he identified with Ya'alon 's message that Israel is much more secure than Iran, despite the threat posed Iran possibly achieving nuclear capability.

Asked if he would repeat his remarks again, Ya'alon told Channel 1 "certainly," adding that the reason he brought up the possibility of attacking Iran was to serve the interests of Israel and the West.

"The need to raise this now is because of the discussion going on in the West, which includes what I see as a baseless claim that there is no military option. That is why it was important for me to say what I said without hurting Israel's security".

After hearing the harsh reaction to his speech, Ya'alon said that not one person who criticized him in Israel bothered to call him and ask about his remarks. "The uproar is coming from sources that are not relevant to this issue and might cause more damage to Israel than the remarks themselves," he said.

Ya'alon is now a fellow at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy and is expected to return to Israel in June.

Straw makes pledge on Israeli nukes

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Israel will not make an issue over British Foreign Minister Jack Straw's statement last week that after the world deals with Iran's nuclear "threat," it will deal with Israel's.

Straw gave a lengthy television interview in Britain last Thursday, following the decision to send Iran's nuclear dossier to the United Nations Security Council for possible sanctions. When asked about a "double standard" regarding Iran, Straw replied: "I want a nuclear-free Middle East. It's the policy of her majesty's government. We've been working to achieve that. We have ensured over the last few years that two of the four countries [in the Middle East] which posed a nuclear threat, Libya and Iraq, have had their nuclear weapons removed," he said.

He then added, "If you want to see a nuclear-free Middle East, you've got to remove that threat from Iran, including the rhetorical threat to wipe Israel off the face of the map... and once you've done that, then we can get on to work at, in respect of Israel."

Straw's remarks were analyzed carefully in Jerusalem, but it was decided not to make an issue of them because Straw made clear that Britain remained "on board" on the Iranian nuclear issue.

"That is the most important thing," one government official said, saying that Israel did not want to deflect from the Iranian issue by drawing attention to itself and creating a diplomatic issue over Straw's comments.

"This isn't the time to discuss this," he said. Besides, he added, Israel has also made it clear that it was in favour of a nuclear-free Middle East, but that discussions about this could only take place in the distant future, after Israel has concluded peace agreements with all the countries in the region.

That the Iranian nuclear issue would ultimately spotlight Israel was not something that has been unexpected, and Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has said that U.S. President George W. Bush's famous letter of April 2004 included a line pledging U.S. commitment to Israel's deterrence capacity.

That letter reads, "The United States reiterates its steadfast commitment to Israel's security, including secure, defensible borders, and to preserve and strengthen Israel's capability to deter and defend itself, by itself, against any threat or possible combination of threats."

Sharon interpreted this as a U.S. promise to back Israel when there were attempts – which he believed would follow the international community's handling of the Iranian nuclear issue to dismantle what he referred to as "Israel's deterrence ability."

Ironically, Straw's interview appeared the same night that a BBC Newsnight report appeared claiming that the United Kingdom supplied Israel with quantities of plutonium while Harold Wilson was prime minister in the 1960s.

Controller slams Disengagement Authority

By DAN IZENBERG
Jeruslem Post

JERUSALEM — In a special report released for publication last week, State Controller Micha Lindenstrauss blasted the Disengagement Authority (Sela), the Prime Minister's Office and the Finance Ministry for their poor performance in handling the evacuation and resettlement of 1,750 families from the Gaza Strip and the West Bank.

"A supreme and concentrated national effort was required of all the ministries that dealt with the disengagement, and above all by the Prime Minister's Office and Sela," wrote Lindenstrauss.

"I especially emphasize the bureaucratic procrastination in the conduct of the Ministry of Finance as it emerges in the [previous] report on reinforcing the Jewish communities on the Israeli side of the Gaza Strip and, now again, regarding Sela. The Finance Ministry and its head ought to have initiated a speedy and concentrated action to remove the obstacles and impediments [to the financing of the authority] in time," he wrote.

The trouble began immediately after the government decision on June 6, 2004, to establish Sela, wrote Lindenstrauss. It took at least 2½ months for the Treasury to submit its request to the Knesset Finance Committee for approval of the allocation to establish the Disengagement Authority. Formal approval of the request was given on Sept. 26, almost three months after the projected date, according to the government timetable.

By Dec. 12, people were working for Sela, but by April that number was only up to 17. Another 38 were hired in the months before the disengagement began on Aug. 17, most of them in June. Some of the delay was bureaucratic. It was only in July 2005, after Sela had filed requests to hire additional workers in February, March and May that a special government committee agreed to lift a hiring freeze for 42 positions. Lindenstrauss also found that the Disengagement Authority had often submitted requests for workers much later than it should have.

Sela was aware of the lack of manpower caused by bureaucratic delays, but according to Lindenstrauss, Sela head Yonatan Bassi "did not warn senior managers of the Prime Minister's Office and the Treasury about the problems with the necessary urgency."

The state controller also examined how Sela handled the resettlement of the evacuees in the aftermath of disengagement.

Despite knowing ahead of time that it would need short-term housing for about half of the families (870), Sela only prepared 800 hotel rooms. On the day the evacuation began, Sela rented another 1,000 rooms, and by the end of the evacuation, it had rented a total of 2,800 rooms. More than six months later, hundreds of families still reside in hotels.

The move to longer-term temporary housing has been delayed because it took longer than expected to complete construction of the mobile homes and other temporary housing in Nitzan, Karmiya and Yad Hanna, and of the 840 rental apartments in Ashkelon reserved for evacuees, only 63 were rented.

In a second report also issued on Wednesday, Lindenstrauss criticized the government for not properly preparing local authorities for absorption of the 1,750 evacuee families.

The government also failed to specify who would pay for some of the special services that had to be provided to the evacuee families.

Lindenstrauss, however, accepted in part the claims of government authorities that they could not provide more detailed information because of the Hof Gaza Regional Council's refusal to provide information and files about the settlers and their needs. In fact, the head of the council threatened to fire any employee who co-operated with the government authorities. Many of the settlers themselves also refused to co-operate with the authorities, wrote Lindenstrauss.

But even with those evacuee services that were set to be financed by the government, it took many months to determine how the grants would be calculated, and consequently, exactly how much money each local authority would receive. It was only in September, two weeks after the evacuation, that the government finally decided on the criteria for allocating funds.

Until then, because they could no longer wait, some of the local authorities began providing necessary services to the evacuees without government approval and in violation of the law.

Also, during the period in which funding guidelines were unclear, the heads of the local authorities put pressure on the government to give them money to cope with the immediate emergency. These allocations were not granted equally, but rather according to the skills and connections of the individual local leaders.

Will hold internal dialogue

that Israel had frozen the controversial building plans in the wake of American pressure.

The long-planned construction of 3,500 housing units on the outskirts of Ma'aleh Adumim, as part of a decade-old government proposal to link the suburban Jerusalem settlement to the capital, has been subject to fierce Palestinian and international condemnation and to American resistance.

Olmert's chief political rival, Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu, has repeatedly used the freeze on building in E1 to call into question the government's determination to strengthen both Jerusalem and the major settlement blocs.

Olmert said if he wins the election, he will wait a "reasonable" amount of time to see whether Hamas recognizes Israel, disavows terrorism, disarms, accepts previous PA-Israel agreements and acts according to the guidelines of the "road map" peace plan.

"We will wait, but I don't intend to wait forever," he said. "If, after a reasonable time passes, it becomes clear that the PA is not willing to accept these principles, we will need to begin to act."

Before acting to draw the borders, however, Olmert said he would hold an "internal dialogue inside Israel to get to a definition that reflects a wide national consensus about what Israel's permanent borders need to be. I intend to speak to everyone, and first and foremost, the public that lives in the territories."

At the same time, he said, he hopes to have a dialogue with the international community to shape an international atmosphere that would "create a change in the PA." If that fails, he said, Israel will determine the border, but will do so with as wide an internal consensus and as much international support as possible.

Olmert said the security fence will eventually be moved to become the country's border, in accordance with the country's interests.

Once a border is determined, he said Israel will "not lose any option for security action in line with our needs in the fight against terrorism, which is to a large degree the case today in Gaza."

Olmert said there are currently no restraints on IDF actions to prevent terror from the Gaza Strip, and he doesn't think there is a need to introduce IDF ground troops into the area.

"The U.S. doesn't restrain us or encourage us. We worry about Israel's security, we don't take advice from the U.S. on what to do," he said. "We do what we think we must, according to our understanding and depending on the circumstances."

Resolution was not balanced

Fogel said CIC had lobbied the previous Liberal government to establish objective criteria by which it would evaluate resolutions. The criteria would serve as tools to determine whether resolutions should be supported. The criteria are whether the resolutions single out Israel; whether they employ excessive language; and whether they are balanced in the treatment of an issue.

When they were in opposition, the Conservatives shared those criteria, he said.

CIC had argued that this approach would "reflect longstanding Canadian values." Canada's vote last week demonstrates Canada's commitment to "resolutions that are constructive and contribute towards moving the process away from conflict to resolution," Fogel said.

In the Globe and Mail report, Gilbert Laurin, Canada's representative at the UN council session, said the UNESC resolution was not balanced and the issue of refugee return is one that should be part of a peace settlement.

The Canadian Coalition for Democracies (CCD) applauded Canada's vote, calling the string of UN resolutions targeting Israel an "abuse of process that has gone on for decades."

The CCD, an advocacy organization that promotes democracy, urged Canada to oppose all other anti-Israel votes until the UN shows balance and moral authority in its resolutions.

"The UN has been corrupted to support the genocidal goals of Israel's enemies, and Canada must not legitimize such a process by its participation," the CCD stated.

Israel Briefs

Israel advised to join NATO

Spain's former prime minister said Israel should become a member of NATO as a warning to Iran. If Israel becomes part of the Western alliance, Iran "will behave differently," Jose Maria Aznar said at a conference organized by Supreme Headquarters Allied Powers Europe, one of NATO's two main military commands. Aznar is now a security analyst. In recent months, Iran's president has alluded repeatedly to a desire to destroy Israel. NATO officials have said the issue of Israel joining the alliance is not being considered right now.

Israel aids Nigeria

Israel sent 1.5 tons of equipment to Nigeria last week to help that country deal with an outbreak of bird flu. The emergency equipment included medical supplies and protective clothing. According to the Foreign Ministry, Nigerian officials contacted Noam Katz, Israel's ambassador in Abuja, about potential assistance.

Voter apathy in Israel

Most young Israelis don't plan to vote in this month's general election, a poll found. The Yediot Achronot survey said only 44 per cent of eligible Israeli voters under age 32 will cast a ballot in the March 28 poll. The apathy is especially pronounced among young immigrants, 72 per cent of whom don't plan to vote. Almost 20 per cent of respondents said their main source of information on Israeli politics is the hit weekend TV satire It's a Wonderful Country.

Dershowitz offers his services

Alan Dershowitz pledged to defend in court any Israeli army officers sued while travelling outside the country. "Israeli military and political figures should have no fear of walking free and proud in any democratic nation, nor should they fear justice," Dershowitz said in Brussels, according to the European Jewish Press. He added: "No part of Europe should become Judenrein to any Israeli leaders who have promoted Israeli policy." The Harvard University law professor was in Brussels as part of his European "Tour for Democracy" aimed at responding to Israel's critics.

Polls predict Kadima will win around 40 seats

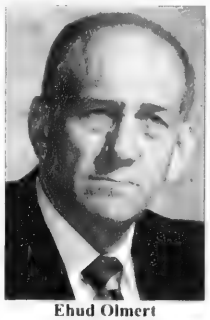
By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

If the Israeli election was held today, Kadima, the centrist party created by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, would receive between 40 and 42 seats in the 120-seat Knesset, political scientist Asher Arian told a luncheon briefing of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) last week.

Though pundits say there is slippage in that number by one seat a week, Kadima looks to be the choice of the plurality of Israeli voters, Arian said. He predicted the party led by acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert would win 35 to 40 seats on election day, March 28.

Though there have been 16 elections in Israel's history, none has produced a majority government.

"I don't want you to get your hopes too high," Arian said. "I'm not sure that [this year's] elections will be the breakthrough elections" many expect them to be.



Ehud Olmert [Israel Sun photo]

Arian, a political science professor at Haifa University and the City University of New York, along with Tamar Hermann, director of the Steinmetz Center for Peace Research at Tel Aviv University, briefed a select group of business and media people last week at the CIJA luncheon. CIJA is a non-partisan, umbrella organization for Jewish community advocacy aimed at increasing support for Israel.

The popularity of a centrist party such as Kadima is unusual in Israel. Parties of the left (Labor) and right (Likud) have traditionally formed the government in coalition with smaller parties. This time, options on the right and left are not as attractive for voters, Arian said.

A longtime monitor of Israeli public opinion attitudes on peace and security, Arian said former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who heads Likud, is unpopular with many voters, while Moroccan-born Labor leader Amir Peretz has been "unable to attract the Sephardi masses to the Labor Party."

Considering the opposition, Olmert "becomes an attractive alternative," he said, adding there was little in Olmert's past that suggested he would one day become Sharon's successor.

As a member of Likud, Olmert was only 34th on the party's electoral list, and his appointment as deputy prime minister was seen at the time as a "symbolic" and "harmless" gesture.

Arian said while the election may be an important contest, it's not one Israelis are particularly engaged in. "It's not a burning campaign," he said.

Following the onset of the Palestinian intifadah, polls showed that Israeli Jews despaired of the conflict ending. Today, only 33 per cent believe a peace treaty could bring an end to the conflict.

That "lack of belief that a settlement is possible… fits nicely with the notion of unilateral disengagement," Arian said.

Hermann – a specialist in Israeli public opinion and a creator of the Peace Index, a broad measure of support for the Oslo process from 1994 to 2005 – agreed the upcoming election would not mark a turning point in Israeli politics. She predicted a plurality of voters would support Kadima because they don't like the Labour and Likud alternatives.

Turning to the Peace Index, Hermann said that even from the earliest days, only about half of Israeli Jews were confident the Oslo process would bear fruit. Support moved up under Netanyahu and began to erode under Barak – even before the intifadah began, she said.

Today, only about 30 per cent support Oslo, though support for an alternative negotiation process stands at around 50 per cent, she said.

Turning to other polling results, Hermann said voters' priorities shifted between November 2005 and February 2006. When voters were asked in November whether the election should focus on economic and social issues or on security matters, 53 per cent said the economy and 36 per cent security. In February, only 37 per cent said the economy, versus 47 per cent for security.

Those findings will likely hurt Labor, which has tried to focus on economic matters and is perceived as weak on security issues, she said

Other polling findings suggest there is more support for talks with Hamas than the government's hardline policy would suggest. Asked in January whether Israel should negotiate with a Hamas-led government, 42.5 per cent of Israeli Jews said yes, down from 50 per cent who would have approved of such talks in May 2005.

Asked in February if Israel should transfer funds to the new Hamas government, 63.5 per cent of Israeli Jews said no.

Forty-seven per cent said Israel should continue to act unilaterally if Hamas backs a "hudna," or ceasefire, Hermann said.

Wilde, wonderful, and Kosher for Passover: new pure juices take market by storm

In response to the growing demand for healthy natural fresh fruit juices, Wilde has raised the bar on quality, taste and nutritional value to unprecedented new heights.

What heights? Consider this: Wilde fruit juices are unique. They're not from concentrate. They're not from puree. No water. No added sugar. No preservatives. They're 100% natural pure juice made with nothing but the pure pressed fruit.

Nothing added, nothing removed

And what fruit! Wilde juices are produced from fruit grown in some of the world's best orchards, located in the lush fruit-growing area of Western Cape in South Africa.

Take the best-selling mango flavour, for example. Imagine picking fresh ripe mangos and pressing your own thick and delicious mango juice, retaining many of the natural vitamins and minerals of the fruit. Unlike other popular juice brands which are diluted with water, apple or other juices, this is 100 percent pure mango juice. Nothing added, nothing removed.

Wilde's top quality fruit is pressed at the peak of ripeness. The juice is then flash pasteurized and sealed in an aseptic package to preserve the nutrients and freshness. Wilde fruit juices do not require refrigeration until they are opened.

To produce a juice of such high quality and great taste at an affordable price, many elements are required:

- an abundant supply of high quality fruits grown close to the plant;
- an artisanal expertise with each different fruit;
- modern and high volume pressing and packing equipment; and
- stringent standards of quality control.

READ THE LABEL

Many juices have almost no nutritional value unless the manufacturer adds vitamin C, despite pictures of beautiful fruit and references to "100% pure juice" or "100% pure juice blend."

The best juice is the liquid that was contained in the fruit: nothing added, nothing removed, i.e. PURE PRESSED juice (not from concentrate).

Pacmar, the manufacturer, produces Wilde juices in an HACCP certified plant, the highest standard recognized worldwide for total quality control. Wilde juices exceed all the quality standards set by Agriculture Canada.

Wilde's spectacular range of flavours includes Pear, Peach, Tropical Fruit Blend, Cranberry Apple Ginger, Wild Berry, Apple / Granny Smith & Golden Delicious,

Highest standards of quality

Strawberry / Pear, Mango / Organge / Cranberry, and Lemon / Pear.

Wilde fruit juices are imported and marketed in North America by Twynz Inc. in partnership with Pacmar.

According to importer and distributor Jack Berkovits of Twynz, the product has been "flying off the shelves" since its recent introduction, and is now available at better supermarkets, specialty and heath food stores across Canada, including most Dominion and A&P Stores, all Longo's stores, Pusateri's, Sobeys Clark & Hilda, Ambrosia, Noah's, The Big Carrot, Whole Foods, and many others.

So confident is Berkovits in the superiority of Wilde that he encourages you to taste any of their competitors' fruit juices and compare!

Pure, natural, delicious, and Kosher for Passover: a win-win situation if ever there was one, both for your Seder table and for your daily enjoyment!

Happy Passover

AUTHOR ANNA PORTER TO PEN STORY OF HEROIC HUNGARIAN JEW

Veteran Canadian publisher and author Anna Porter has signed a two-book deal worth six figures with Douglas & McIntyre, the Toronto-based publishing house. The deal gives D&M rights to reissue The Storyteller: Memory, Secrets, Magic and Lies, Porter's portrait of her grandfather originally published in 2000. D&M also plans to publish Kasztner's Train, a new non-fiction work-in-progress by Porter.

Kasztner's Train will focus on the heroic efforts of Hungarian Jew Reszo Kasztner to save the Jews of Budapest from the Nazis in 1944 and '45. Despite Kasztner's righteous deeds, he was judged harshly in Israel after the war, and was tragically murdered in the street near his home shortly before a judge fully exonerated him.

"I'm anxious to get on with the research in Hungary and Israel, and the exciting challenge of the writing," said Porter of the newly commissioned project, which the publisher plans to promote with a large marketing campaign.

Kasztner's story "might be called the Hungarian Schindler's List, and it's every bit as heart-wrenching and searingly important as that story was," said D&M president Scott McIntyre. Look for the title on bookstore shelves in the autumn of 2007.

Her Doc Goes to UN: Brooke Goldstein, a Torontonian who went to law school in New York and has begun practising as a human rights lawyer, has made The Making Of A Martyr, a feature-length documentary film that has been accepted for inclusion in Stories from the Field, the second annual United Nations Documentary Film Festival.

Contacted by telephone, Goldstein said that she felt compelled to make the film after hearing about a 15-year-old Palestinian child who was apprehended at an Israeli checkpoint with bombs strapped to his waist. She interviewed the boy, his family and even the people who recruited him for the 58-minute film, which is her first production.

The film is to be screened at the United Nations in late April and is also in the running for an Audience Choice Award. We wish the former Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) student every success with the film as well as with her budding law and film careers.

Pre-Passover Concert: Five diverse inter-generational choirs sing at Ashira L'AdoShem, From Generation to Generation, a pre-Passover concert. The choirs are the Renanim Youth Singers, the Varsity Jews (from the University of Toronto), Kol Neshama (York University) and the Miles Nadal JCC community and youth choirs. Patrons $350, adult $50-$35, students $15. Leah Posluns Theatre, March 21, 7:30 p.m.

Names in the News: Helen Levine, former professor of the school of social work at Carleton University in Ottawa, describes herself as "an 82-year-old feminist." The sometimes-essayist has also proven to be an avid letter writer, as she demonstrated in a year-long correspondence with close friend Oonagh Berry, also of Ottawa.

Although Levine and Berry saw and spoke to each other often during the year, they exchanged dozens of handwritten letters, having chosen to express their political and personal thoughts via the old-fashioned medium of pen and paper. Their missives, which explore their deepening friendship as well as various feminist-related issues and other matters, have been preserved in Between Friends: A Year in Letters, a softcover book published by Second Story Press of Toronto.

"Maybe some people will be turned off by the feminist emphasis – that wouldn't surprise me – but I think in general the book will have broad appeal," Levine told Eye on Arts. "We've already had very good feedback from a lot of people."

Many people today "yearn for a letter that's handwritten," Levine observed, noting that the book seems to "trigger something in the reader that makes them want to have a handwritten correspondence." The year she and Berry were writing letters to each other "was one of the happiest years in my life," she said.

Levine received the Governor General's Person's Award in 1989 and is the mother of Karen Levine, author of the bestseller Hana's Suitcase, which was also published by Second Story.

Arts in Brief

• Friends of Yiddish presents Mitchell Leonard Smolkin in From Cantor's Chant to Yiddish Song, a musical examination of the songs of Moishe Oysher, Aaron Lebedev, Jan Peerce and Toronto's own Louis Danto. "All of these men have in common the distinction of having brought their brilliance in cantorial music to the Yiddish song," said Smolkin. Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, 100 Elder St. Sunday, March 19, 2 p.m. Members free, guests $10.

• There's still time to see "Windows, Gables, Gingerbread and Gargoyles," an exhibit of some 50 works in various media by artist Linda R. Goldman, who has been capturing details of Toronto buildings in her work for 35 years. The show, which includes watercolours, photographs and textiles, continues at the Market Gallery, St. Lawrence Market, until March 26.

• "Through Others' Eyes," an exhibition of photos from Givat Haviva, Israel, reflects the co-operative work of Jewish and Arab youth from neighbouring villages, documenting their visits to each other's homes and communities. The show is on view in the lobby of the Berkeley Street Theatre until April 1 to complement the current production of The Arab-Israeli Cookbook.

• Jeffrey Shandler, author of Adventures in Yiddishland, and Michael Wex, author of Born to Kvetch: Yiddish Language and Culture in All Its Moods, discuss the power of Yiddish and sign copies of their books at New York's Jewish Museum, Thursday, March 16, 6:30 p.m. The event is moderated by Barbara Kirshenblatt-Gimblett, professor of Hebrew and Judaic studies at New York University. Wex is a Torontonian and Kirshenblatt-Gimblett a former Torontonian.

Controversial films lose out at Oscars

By TOM TUGEND
JTA

Munich and Paradise Now, two films that caused considerable controversy in the North American Jewish community and Israel, came up empty-handed at this year's Academy Awards.

Non-controversial was the selection of Rachel Weisz as best supporting actress in The Constant Gardner, in which she played an activist fighting an international pharmaceutical company.

Weisz was born in London, after her father and mother came to England as Jewish refugees in the 1930s, from Hungary and Austria respectively.

Host Jon Stewart left no doubt about his ethnic heritage in his opening monologue. After pointing to Steven Spielberg in the audience, Stewart mentioned the director's films Schindler's List and Munich, and then cracked, "I speak for all Jews when I say I can't wait for what happens to us next."

Munich, Spielberg's take on the Israeli hunt for the Palestinian killers of its athletes at the 1972 Olympic Games, struck out on all of its five nominations, including best picture and best director.

The film has been criticized, particularly in Israel, for allegedly drawing a moral equivalence between the terrorists and the pursuing Mossad agents, as well as for historical inaccuracy.

Paradise Now, an entry in the foreign-language film category, has drawn even more heat from a small but vocal part of the Jewish community, which said the film "humanized" two suicide bombers on a mission to blow up a Tel Aviv bus.

The film had originally been listed as coming from the non-existent country of "Palestine," though it was made by an Israeli Arab. At the March 5 award show, its provenance was given as the "Palestinian territories."

Stewart, apparently trying to beat previous Oscar host Billy Crystal in the Jewish gag category, also took note of presenter Ben Stiller, who appeared onstage in a green unitard that covered his body from head to toe.

"It's nice to have proof he's really Jewish," Stewart cracked.

In the documentary short subject category, the Oscar went to A Note of Triumph: The Golden Age of Norman Corwin, celebrating the 95-year old Jewish writer who is noted for his inspiring radio dramas.

Waters says Israel show must go on

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

TEL AVIV — British rocker Roger Waters' upcoming trip to Israel has aroused the ire of Palestinian artists.

However, Waters, who is most famous for being the singer-songwriter of the classic band Pink Floyd, was not deterred by their complaint, the Guardian reported last week.

The Palestinian Association for Contemporary Art and the League of Palestinian Artists wrote to Waters to express its dismay.

"Palestinian as well as several international artists asked in shock: how can the artist whose name around the world was for many years associated with breaking walls of injustice be in any way complicit with the monstrosity of Israel's wall, declared illegal by the international court of justice?"

Last year, Waters was among several British artists who supported a campaign against the West Bank security barrier. At the time, Waters said, "The poverty inflicted by the wall has been devastating for Palestinians. It has kept children from their schools, the sick from proper medical care and continues to destroy the Palestinian economy."

Last week, Waters refused to consider cancelling his trip. "I have a lot of fans in Israel, many of whom are refuseniks. I would not rule out going to Israel because I disapprove of the foreign policy any more than I would refuse to play in the U.K. because I disapprove of Tony Blair's foreign policy."

The concert in Tel Aviv will take place June 22 at Hayarkon Park.

Correction

In "Actor hopes to land TV role during 'pilot season,'" (CJN, March 9) the title of the first movie actor Adam Rodness will appear in, Sammi Miami: Surviving, was incorrect. The CJN regrets the error.

Canadian writes bio of legendary Jewish boxer

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Douglas Century, the Canadian author of a new biography on Barney Ross, one of the greatest Jewish boxers of all time, was figuratively introduced to him when he was a 10-year-old Peretz School student in Calgary in the 1970s.

Century's teacher, a Holocaust survivor whom his students regarded with a mixture of terror and awe, told the class about Ross one morning, and Century was transfixed and hooked.

He promptly looked him up in the Encyclopedia Judaica and read that Ross had been an extraordinary athlete who held the world's lightweight, junior welterweight and welterweight championships in the 1930s.

As well, he discovered that Ross, born Beryl Rasofsky in 1909, had been a war hero in the Pacific theatre, an ardent Zionist and, indirectly, a gun runner during Israel's 1948 War of Independence.

Several years ago, Century, a 40-year-old Princeton University graduate and a freelance journalist based in New York City, was asked to write a book about what he describes as "this beautiful, graceful prizefighter."

Last month, after he spent five years on the project, Century's book, Barney Ross (Schocken), was published.

Century, who considers Ross as the most-admired Jewish athlete in the United States apart from legendary baseball player Hank Greenberg, said that he was the last of the great Jewish boxers.

Though he was physically unprepossessing, having been weakened from bouts with asthma and poor nutrition, Ross had quick hands and a rock-solid chin, and could absorb almost any punch without staggering.

Embodying "the fantasy of Jewish force" in an era of open and brutal anti-Semitism, Ross was clearly a hero in the eyes of his fans.

"He touched on pivotal moments of history – Jewish immigration to the U.S., the changing status of Jews in American society, the emergence of Israel," said Century in a recent interview in Toronto.

Ross, whose pious father was a dairyman and a small grocer in Brest-Litovsk, Poland, was raised to be a Hebrew teacher and talmudic scholar. Ross drifted away from tradition, but refused to train and fight on High Holy Days, said Century.

Although he was a demon in the ring, he was warm and empathetic and widely beloved.

"He would give you the shirt off his back," Century said.

Wounded in Guadalcanal, where he earned a Silver Star for heroism under Japanese fire, Ross developed a morphine addiction during his treatment in hospital. He kicked the habit, and for the rest of his life he campaigned against drug abuse.

Toward the close of World War II, he allied himself with Peter Bergson, a right-wing Zionist who was associated with Menachem Begin, a future prime minister of Israel.

Diagnosed with cancer in 1966 after feeling inexplicable pain in his jaw, Ross died on Jan. 18, 1967. He was only 57.

In preparing himself to write Barney Ross, Century – a former cultural reporter on the staff of the Forward and a self-styled jack-of-all-trades writer – read widely.

He scoured Ross' memoir, No Man Stands Alone, published in 1957, but found it rife with inconsistencies. Century also waded into such works as Ross' out-of-print primer, Fundamentals of Boxing, Harold Ribalow's The Jew in American Sport and Allen Bodner's When Boxing Was a Jewish Sport.

He was also fortunate enough to talk to Ross' brother, George, who confirmed names and dates, and Ross' first cousin, Alvin, who shared many memories.

The hardest part about writing the book was boiling it down to some 200 pages. Brevity, he learned yet again, is an art to be cultivated.

Travel Talk

BY BILL GLADSTONE

RAMBLES OF UNCLE JOE – FINDS SHUL IN DEEP SOUTH

My Uncle Joseph is the sort of gentleman who always stops to smell the roses. Recently, he and my Aunt Elizabeth drove to Florida on vacation. Their rambling route took them through many small towns and along many side roads. They spent six days on the road.

They were admiring an old Gothic church in Savannah, Ga., when they noticed a singular Jewish feature of the architecture – a Jewish star suspended above the arched entrance. Turns out they had happened upon Mickve Israel, home of Georgia's oldest congregation. It was established in 1733, only five months after the establishment of the colony of Georgia, and is the third-oldest congregation in the United States.

A Jewish star over the main entrance is the only clue that Savannah's Mickve Israel is a synagogue instead of the Gothic church that it so elegantly resembles. The congregation dates from 1733, the building from 1876.

Joe and Elizabeth were offered a tour, which proved fascinating and memorable. "Where else but in America," he marvelled, "could you get a black, Yiddish-speaking, Christian tour guide in a Gothic synagogue designed to look like a church?"

The community was founded by 42 colonists, mostly Spanish or Portuguese crypto-Jews from London. The congregation disbanded before the American Revolutionary War, but from its minyans came Mordecai Sheftall, the highest- ranking Jewish officer of the American Revolutionary forces. Its minyan resumed in 1786.

Out of deference to the old Sephardi minhag or tradition of its founders, it was nearly a century before the congregation took its first hesitant steps toward Reform Judaism, which it ultimately embraced.

The building, designed by an English architect in the style of a 14th-century cathedral, dates from 1876 and replaces an earlier structure. It houses an archival museum in which 10 presidential letters are on display, signed by George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, George Bush, Bill Clinton and others.

Uncle Joe was delighted with the combination of Jewish heimishkeit and southern hospitality he met with at Mickve Israel, and heartily recommends a visit to all fellow ramblers. The temple is located in Monterey Square, Savannah. Its phone number is 912-233-1547.

Portrait of Guggenheims is a story of assimilation

The Guggenheims by Irwin and Debi Unger, HarperCollins.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Irwin and Debi Unger's portrait of a great American Jewish family, The Guggenheims, is a story of business accomplishments, philanthropy and assimilation.

The Guggenheims, one of America's wealthiest Jewish families, funded the arts like few dynasties in the United States and were influential in publishing, aviation and horse racing.

Their loyalty to their Jewish roots, however, was weak, and by the mid-20th century, the majority of the descendants of Simon Guggenheim, the family's patriarch, had become Christians.

Irwin and Debi Unger

Simon and his new bride, Rachel Weil Meyers, left their home in Switzerland in 1847, bound for what they hoped would be greener pastures in Philadelphia. They did not prosper greatly, but their ambitious and driven son, Meyer, acquired the untold wealth that catapulted the Guggenheims into the realm of the super-rich and the "our crowd" Jewish plutocrats.

A peddler of "notions," Meyer started off modestly as a purveyor of a deceptively simple product, stove polish. Branching out, he imported and sold spices and then acquired stocks in railroad, mining and smelting companies.

Meyer and his brothers, Isaac, Daniel, Murray, Simon, Benjamin and Solomon, expanded the Guggenheim holdings. By the 1880s, they had joined the ranks of the German-Jewish elite in New York city, consisting, in part, of the Seligmans, the Goldmans, the Lehmans and the Loebs. None of these families was included in the first edition of the Social Register of socially acceptable and wealthy families. Being Jews, they were excluded from the city's and country's finest private clubs and fancy resorts.

When Meyer died in 1904, the Guggenheims were embroiled in a struggle over control of the American Smelting and Refining Company (ASARCO), which extracted and refined copper, silver, lead, tin and gold.

But having gained close to half of its stock, they became its largest shareholders. Worth an estimated $100 million (US) in 1905, the Guggenheims were supposedly the richest Jewish family after the legendary Rothschilds. They grew still wealthier during World War I, when there was an insatiable demand for copper-plated telephone wires connecting command posts and trenches.

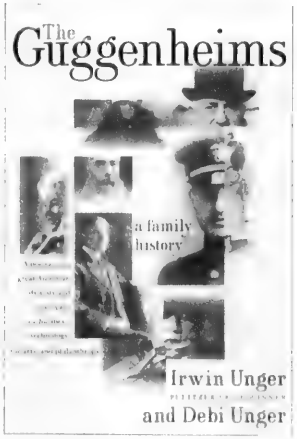
Thanks to mines and smelting plants in the United States, Canada and Latin America, their fortune peaked in the 1920s, only to decline a decade later.

The Ungers' treatment of the clan's business acumen is sweeping and informative, but most readers will probably be more interested in their sketches of family members.

Daniel, one of the most important Guggenheims, left an estate of $13 million when he died in 1930, but he had already bequeathed vast sums for the advancement of aeronautics and civic causes. His funeral attracted the mayor of New York as well as Charles Lindbergh, the famous trans-Atlantic flier.

Daniel's older son, Robert, was self-indulgent, a sexual adventurer and a disgraced ambassador to Portugal. When he married a horsewoman from a Social Register family, he converted to Roman Catholicism.

Gladys, Daniel's youngest child, wed Roger Straus, whose uncles owned R.H. Macy, the Manhattan department store, and whose father, Oscar, had been secretary of commerce under President Theodore Roosevelt, the first Jew to hold a cabinet position in the United States. Gladys, who was active in the United Jewish Appeal, carried "the burden" of being Jewish in Guggenheim circles.



Harold, a scion of one of the seven original brothers who enlarged the family's portfolio, met Ernest Hemingway, the budding novelist, in Paris after World War I. They played tennis, boxed and talked about books and literature. Robert Cohn, one of the major characters in Hemingway's 1926 novel, The Sun Also Rises, was modelled after Harold.

Harry Frank Guggenheim, Daniel's younger son, was the repository of the family's historical memory during much of the last century. A formidable figure in thoroughbred racing, he was the first Jew to be admitted into the waspish New York Jockey Club. Harry sunk millions of dollars into the promotion of aeronautics, and he and his wife, Alicia Patterson, founded the daily Newsday.

Like many Jews of his ilk, Harry was an anti-Zionist. When his friend, Lindbergh, aligned himself with Nazi Germany, excused Adolf Hitler's persecution of Jews and expressed anti-Semitic views, Harry rushed to his defence, claiming that he was politically naive. Harry's son-in-law was disappointed, concluding that he had no compunctions about deceiving himself for the sake of preserving his friendship with Lindbergh. It speaks volumes that Harry brought up his daughters as Christians.

Peggy, one of the most notable Guggenheims, was a huge patron of the arts, one of her leading "disciples" being the abstract painter Jackson Pollock. Yet she could be monumentally parsimonious. Her husband complained that during most of their married life they "lived in a house with orange crates."

When she visited Palestine in the 1920s, she was disgusted by the haredi Jews she saw praying at the Western Wall in Jerusalem. "It mortified me to belong to my people," said Peggy, who once tried, without success, to fix her bulbous nose through plastic surgery. "The nauseating sight of my compatriots publicly groaning and moaning and going into physical contortions was more than I could bear, and I was glad to leave the Jews again."

Peggy's attitude may have been formed by a single searing experience. When she was a teenager, she and her parents were refused a night's lodging in Vermont because they were Jewish. She later noted that this snub "gave me an inferiority complex."

As the Ungers discreetly put it, the Guggenheims' allegiance to their faith was "fragile at best."

During the late 1930s, William Guggenheim married Elizabeth Newell, a WASP of the finest pedigree, and they enrolled their son in the Sons of the American Revolution. William detached himself completely from his circle of Jewish friends and acquaintances and, like one of his uncles, joined the Episcopal church and associated with "only good Gentile society."

Another Guggenheim, Iris Cornelia Love, the great-granddaughter of Isaac and an archeologist in her own right, was raised as an Episcopalian.

According to the Ungers, few of the Guggenheims today cherish their ancestry, and still fewer have a sense of family tree.

But the Guggenheims, even under different names such as Agostini, Kerby and Piven, continue to carve out names for themselves as entrepreneurs, stockbrokers, lawyers, real estate developers, computer experts, business managers, artists and theatre performers.

Many of them are no longer Jewish but are still making contributions to American society in an array of fields.

Exercise raises concerns about modesty for the Orthodox

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Although the word "exercise" and the term "Orthodox" tend not to go together much in the public mind, in fact, many Orthodox do indeed realize the importance of being fit, eating healthy and, yes, exercising.

Many of the sages have advised it, most notably Maimonides, the 12th-century rabbi, philosopher and physician, who wrote extensively about the importance of taking care of the body. Many others have echoed his words, noting that maintaining good health honours God's creation and enables us to study and carry out His laws.

This is exercise for the sake of health, not for hedonistic reasons. Activities such as bodybuilding, for instance, are considered by many Orthodox as being akin to the ancient Greek worship of the human form.

That being said, there are more serious considerations for the Orthodox person who wants to exercise, than deciding on Pilates or aerobics, particularly for the Orthodox woman. These considerations revolve mainly around tzniut, modesty.

Psalms 45:14, generally translated as "the glory of the daughter of the King is entirely within," is taken to mean that dressing provocatively is to be avoided and basically that what is inside is more important than what is outside. This philosophy also implies that men and women are not supposed to look at the other sex immodestly dressed.

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, spiritual leader of Kehillat Shaarei Torah and secretary of the Vaad Harabonim, said that the Talmud exhorts women to cover certain parts of the body. Sleeves must reach the elbow and skirts are to be below the knee. Slacks, which are considered men's clothing, are not permitted.

Theoretically, Rabbi Tradburks said, women can exercise in skirts, perhaps with tights under them, and in loose tops with long sleeves, but he recognizes that "it would be extremely uncomfortable" for them.

Obviously, these issues do not apply in a home environment or in an all-women gym. Exercising on fitness equipment in the home, however, the rabbi recognizes, is not as satisfactory or as effective.

It is no more acceptable, he added, for women to see men immodestly dressed than it is for men to see women that way.

Matthew and Felicia Taub have operated Sensible Fitness Solutions in the heavily haredi Bathurst and Lawrence area of the city since last fall.

Certified physical fitness professionals, they began their careers giving private lessons in people's homes. Since many of their clientele are part of that community, they became sensitized to their particular needs. Having Orthodox relatives, Matthew said, made them more aware and "supersensitive" on the subject.

When they opened their facility, they wanted to make sure that the Orthodox, particularly Orthodox women, would be comfortable there. Matthew only gives instruction to men and boys. "I have never even seen what goes on in the women's classes," he said.

"We guarantee privacy – doors are locked during classes, and we make sure that there are no interruptions."

In the room where group classes in yoga and aerobics are held, the windows are two-thirds tinted glass. "We left the top clear, so that sunshine, which is rejuvenating, can come in," said Felicia.

These accommodations have made haredi women feel welcome and comfortable, Matthew said. "We even have young girls from the nearby Orthodox high schools coming in to get fit."

There are classes for haredi men and boys, held at separate times and under the same conditions.

Besides the issues of tzniut, the Taubs are cognizant of Orthodox cultural norms. Much of the music used in regular gyms is not considered appropriate in the Orthodox world, so even the tapes used as background are carefully vetted.

HONOURING WOMEN: The Israel Cancer Research Fund's fifth annual Women of Action Luncheon on April 5 honours four women for their contribution to society, and establishes research fellowships in their names. This year's honorees are gallery owner Sandra Ainsley, community volunteer Lesley Binstock Offman, developmental biologist Dr. Janet Rossant of the Hospital for Sick Children and Globe and Mail columnist Margaret Wente. Prof/acting coach set to write his 6th novel

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

David Rotenberg knows a thing or two about juggling multiple careers. The Toronto native is a university professor, an acting coach to internationally known Canadian stars, an artistic director of an acting school and the author of the acclaimed Zhong Fong mystery series.

Recently, Rotenberg signed onto a new project that that adds another challenge to his career-juggling act. He's now set to write an epic novel set in pre-Maoist Shanghai for Penguin Canada. It will feature some Iraqi Jews as main characters, he says. "The Iraqi Jews had a lot to do with the making of Shanghai."

The Penguin deal comes roughly six months after the release of The Golden Mountain Murders (McArthur), Rotenberg's fifth thriller featuring the exploits of Shanghai detective Zhong Fong.

Rotenberg, 56, has written the five books in roughly eight years, while holding down a day job as a professor in the drama department of York University, running the Professional Actors Lab and coaching actors.

He's the personal acting coach of some leading Canadian actors, among them, Rachel McAdams, a co-star of such hit films as The Wedding Crashers and The Family Stone; Scott Speedman, who is currently starring in Underworld: Evolution; and David Hirsh, star of Naked Josh, on Bravo.

Rotenberg's close connection to McAdams stems from her days at York. He was her professor and has helped guide her career. "We prepare the performances with her. She and I talked her way through The Family Stone... She was the best thing in Wedding Crashers."

So how does a Jewish drama professor and prominent acting coach end up writing stories about Shanghai? In fact, the books are a byproduct of Rotenberg's theatre work.

He spent 14 weeks in Shanghai in 1995 and while he was there landed a theatre gig as visiting artist at the Shanghai Theatre Academy. "I was hired by the People's Republic of China to direct the first Canadian play ever translated into Mandarin [George Ryga's drama The Ecstasy of Rita Joe]."

The Chinese chose him for the project because he had both theatrical and teaching experience. "Half the people in the production were students. They were looking for someone who could direct the students and produce the play at the same time."

David Rotenberg

He says the Shanghai experience inspired to him to write a mystery story about the intricacies of everyday life in modern-day China; the book is centred on a leading character, Zhong Fong – he is named after Rotenberg's "gung-ho translator"– a police detective who "rankles the authorities."

The books tackle topics that are considered to be very controversial in China, he adds. In Golden Mountain Murders, Zhong Fong investigates a mysterious AIDS epidemic in An Hui province, while abortion is a central theme of the third book, The Hua Shan Hospital Murders, (McArthur).

The other mysteries include The Shanghai Murders: A Mystery of Love and Ivory (St. Martin's Press), The Lake Ching Murders (St. Martin's Press) and The Hamlet Murders (McArthur).

"I write one book every 18 months," Rotenberg says, noting that Zhong Fong is also aging at the same rate that he is. "It was important to me to have him age."

He has also worked extensively in television and film, as a writer and an acting coach. His credits include The New Kung Fu, My Secret Identity, Friday the 13th and Missing Treasures.

Rotenberg is married to Susan Santiago, a lawyer-turned fundraiser, and he is the father of Joey, 20, and Beth, 17.

The second oldest of four boys, Rotenberg grew up in the Bathurst and Lawrence area. He became interested in theatre at the age of 15 when he attended a summer theatre camp at Manitouwabing. He later honed his directing skills at a prestigious summer youth theatre program in Rochester, N.Y.

He graduated from the University of Toronto, and received a master's of fine arts degree in directing from the Yale School of Drama in 1976. Rotenberg did regional theatre work, and he directed two Broadway plays, The News and 1940's Radio Hours.

He taught at Tulane University for a year before making the move back to Canada. "New Orleans was a lousy place for kids, but it was a glorious place for adults," he says.

When York offered him a job in 1986, Rotenberg returned to Toronto to be closer to his family.

Rotenberg says so far he has had no difficulty balancing competing career demands. "I can come home after teaching and write for four to five hours."

However, the new Shanghai epic may throw the career juggling off-kilter because of the enormity of the project which is slated to be completed August 2007. "All of a sudden a great many tangents in my life have come together in this novel," Rotenberg muses. "One of the three strands in my life has now moved forward.

"If I had to choose, I would choose writing overall. I will be dedicating myself to writing this novel."

But he says he's not making any major scheduling adjustments at this time. "I may just have to follow the advice of one of my professors from Yale. Whenever we complained about time challenges, he would say: 'You just carry on. Learn to sleep less.'"

Films chronicle Israeli Arabs and Palestinians

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Three interesting documentaries screened recently at Voices Forward: A Festival of Israeli and Palestinian Film and Culture offered revealing glimpses of Israeli Arabs and Palestinians.

In Since You've Been Gone, Israeli actor and director Mohammed Bakri, a star of the stage and screen, ruminates on events that have convulsed Israel since the death of his mentor and friend, Emil Habibi, in 1996.

As the film opens, Bakri visits the grave of Habibi, an Israel Prize winner, writer and politician who worked for coexistence between Jews and Arabs. In flashbacks, Habibi observes that the fate of Israelis and Palestinians is inextricably linked.

Bakri, tall, craggy-faced and pensive, suggests that Habibi was fortunate not to have witnessed the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising, which brought with it day-long riots in the Israeli Arab sector and a succession of suicide bombings that wrecked the already ailing peace process.

There are archival film clips of the brief Israeli Arab insurrection, of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's stroll on the Temple Mount – a walk that touched off the intifadah – and of an Israeli army operation in the West Bank town of Jenin in 2002.

As a result of the controversy surrounding Israel's incursion into Jenin, a hotbed of terrorism, Bakri decided to make a film about it. But Jenin, Jenin was generally regarded as pro-Palestinian and set tongues wagging in Israel.

In Since You've Been Gone, Bakri documents his legal battle to get Jenin, Jenin into Israeli movie theatres and his relationship with his lawyer, Avigdor Feldman, the son of Holocaust survivors.

Since You've Been Gone also deals with Bakri's reaction to the arrest of his two nephews, charged with aiding a suicide bomber who blew up a bus in June 2002 near Mount Meron.

Despite these traumatic developments, Bakri does not lose his faith in Arab-Israeli reconciliation. As he puts it, "There is hope."

•••

Al Jisr, by Ebitsam Marana, turns on a poor Israeli Arab fishing village north of Haifa that was untouched by the 1948 Arab-Israeli war. Its inhabitants did not flee, nor were they expelled. But the village is remote and poor, far off the beaten track.

The film, produced by Yosi Leon and Noam Shalev, unfolds through the eyes of two twentysomething residents during a municipal election: a former Israeli shot-put champion who wants to be a sports teacher and feels she has not fulfilled her potential as an athlete and a wistful fisherman who loves the sea.

The film's message is that Al Jisr is a microcosm of Israel's neglect of Israeli Arab towns and villages. But this message is softened by joyful scenes in which the whole village celebrates a wedding.

•••

Azza El Hassan's Kings and Extras is about a missing and irreplaceable film archive that disappeared during Israel's invasion of Lebanon in 1982.

The archive was an integral part of the Palestine Liberation Organization's Media Unit, which was founded in Beirut during the 1967 Six Day War.

Hassan travels to Lebanon, Syria, Jordan and the West Bank in an effort to track down the reels. She regards her investigation as an important mission since the archive is a treasure-trove of Palestinian images.

Although Kings and Extras is something of a road movie, it essentially deals with the nature of Palestinian identity.

Israeli ice dancers finish eighth at Turin

By MIRAY CHESKES-GRANOVSKY
Special to The CJN

Skating for Israel in their third Olympics, Galit Chait and Sergei Sakhnovski finished eighth overall in the ice dance competition at the recently completed Winter Games in Turin, Italy.

Still very emotional about their results, Sakhnovski said, "We gave everything for the Olympics, now we are empty. The results are politics."

"They have changed the marking system, but the judges are the same," Chait added. "Judges can use the system to put a team wherever they want."

"They [the judges] clobbered us," Chait said. "It was more interesting for us, because we had to fight back."

The couple skated cleanly in the original dance and edged up to ninth place. Sakhnovski described the original dance as "electric."

"The crowd was unbelievable," Chait added.

For their free dance, the Israelis took to the ice immediately after the Italian duo. "We had no connection with the audience," said Sakhnovski.

"The crowd gave all their energy to the Italians. Their hearts were with them," Chait said.

Galit Chait and Sergei Sakhnovski

Chait and Sakhnovski began skating together 11 years ago. Chait, born in Israel, and Sakhnovski, from Moscow, were both looking for new dance partners when a coach suggested that they try skating together.

After a successful tryout, Sakhnovski left Russia for Israel to train with Chait at the Canada Centre in Metulla. Now training in New Jersey, the Israelis are coached by renowned ice dancers Alexander Zhulin and Evgeny Platov.

"We have never missed a competition in 11 years together. We are strict about our training. We have a strong work ethic," Chait said. The couple practises six days a week, six to seven hours a day.

They speak with great pride about representing Israel.

"Israel has achieved a lot more than other countries in a very short time," Sakhnovski said. "Israel has grown so much in sport and art."

"It's a small country, and you don't necessarily hear about winter sports, but any stadium that we go to always has fans and it's a great honour," Galit added.

The couple's fans can be seen waving Israeli flags and shouting "Yisrael" from the stands. The Israeli team's Olympic performances were broadcast live on Israeli TV and received very high ratings, to the surprise and excitement of Chait and Sakhnovski.

"So many people were behind us. People were watching and were interested. There were so many fans," Chait said.

In the future, Chait and Sakhnovski hope to promote figure skating in Israel by coaching Israeli kids and developing training programs for competitive skaters.

Chait said she's amazed at the number of talented skaters in Israel and feels the country would benefit from a centrally located rink.

"The Canada Centre in Metulla is a great facility. It's just far. If they had a rink in Tel Aviv, that would be unbelievable," she said.

Chait and Sakhnovski are currently training for the World Figure Skating Championships, to be held this month in Calgary.

"Our job is to skate. We skate for the art and the audience, not for the judges," Sakhnovski said.

He'd like to see more transparency and openness under the new marking system.

Under that system, skaters don't know which judges are marking them or the marks from each judge until several weeks after the competition. Even then, only some of the results are released, depriving skaters of the chance to ask judges for feedback on their performances.

When asked how long the couple will continue to compete, Chait replied, "If everything is OK, we would like to continue for another year."

Sakhnovski gave a less definite response. "We'll see [after Worlds]," he said.

The sheltered young readers of Canada

ARTS IN FOCUS
By Oren Shefa

A recent decision by the York Region District School Board to pull a controversial book from the Ontario Library Association's (OLA) prestigious Silver Birch Award recreational reading program for kids in grades 4 to 6, and the decisions of four other Ontario boards to limit access to it, has provoked a debate over age-appropriate reading material.

The book, Three Wishes: Palestinian and Israeli Children Speak, by Deborah Ellis, is based on interviews with kids about their perspectives on the Mideast conflict and growing up in a hostile environment, as well as their general feelings toward one another.

The issue is not one of censorship, as was suggested by OLA director Larry Moore in a recent Toronto Star article. The book has not been removed from schools or libraries, and it's never been part of Ontario's formal public school curriculum. It is, however, about policymakers taking action to shelter Canadian youth from harsh realities.

The Silver Birch program aims to encourage recreational reading by Ontario elementary students aged eight to 11. Twenty books by Canadian authors are nominated by the OLA each year, with fiction and non-fiction winners selected by the children. The books are not mandatory reading and as such are not discussed within an organized lesson plan.

This lack of guidance, more than anything else, has evoked concern from a number of organizations, most vocally from Canadian Jewish Congress, which argues that the book unfairly depicts Israelis as "brutal occupiers" and Palestinians as "murderers," and that without the context of history, children will be unable to fully comprehend the complexity of the issue.

Regardless of when children are first introduced to this highly charged and complicated dispute, without any historical context, understanding where the animosity on both sides stems from is exceedingly difficult. It is, therefore, troubling to hear that Ontario school boards are taking the easy way out, rather than seizing the opportunity to educate children on an issue that could greatly affect their futures.

As to whether or not older elementary school children even have the capacity to understand such a multifaceted issue, one needs to look no further than Ellis' book itself as evidence supporting just such an ability. One Israeli child, Gili, shares the following: "I hear a lot about the war. I'm eight, which is not too young to know about wars and bombs." Then, talking about a guard who was killed while protecting a school, Gili continues: "I was very sad when I heard about it… Guards are supposed to protect us, but he couldn't protect himself. If a bomb can kill a guard, it can also kill me or my family."

Children have a greater ability to cope with and understand complicated and disturbing issues than we give them credit for, but they need guidance. Teachers and parents have less to fear from a child's loss of innocence than from the blanket of naiveté that Canadian children live under when compared to their counterparts growing up in almost every other part of the world.

We Canadians are fortunate to live in a diverse and, for the most part, harmonious society where war, overt racism and religious persecution are the kinds of things that usually happen elsewhere. But we are also part of an ever-shrinking global village where those realities are prevalent and require the participation of all nations to ameliorate or solve.

It may be horrific to think about children living and dying in war-torn communities around the world, but, sadly, they don't have the luxury of blinding themselves to what happens around them. Our children belong to that same global community. It's to their benefit, not detriment, to be taken by the hand and exposed to the world that exists beyond the safety of their own borders.

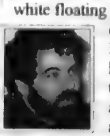
New seasons, new reasons

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER



To every season, there is a reason. To every season, there is a certain character.

Autumn is a second spring when every leaf is a flower. – Albert Camus

Fall is a time, appropriately named, when the leaves turn colour, each one of them looking like the palette of a sloppy painter as they flit and flutter to the ground. Cold winds begin to hijack the hot summer breezes, and we instinctively keep our limbs closer to our bodies so as to stay warm.

Fall prepares us mentally for those private winter days that will soon be upon us. We wonder more, walking with our heads tilted upward, considering the colourful, curious, chilly changes happening around us. Fall is the favourite season of many. It is because nature seems to tuck itself into bed and begin resting for an eventual rebirth – a process humankind continually revisits

Winter arrives like the unannounced visiting auntie. One morning we look out and spot tiny white floating flakes and announce with mixed emotions, "Oh, look it's snowing." Every year, since my childhood I kind of believed, or perhaps hoped, this year the snow will stay away and the ads will read: "It's February. Visit balmy Canada." But alas the snow always returns and we layer our bodies in down and wool, and one inevitable morning our car slides a bit past the stop sign and we comment in our heads, "Woo, that was a close one."

Winter lasts forever. During the short days of January, on those frigidly frosty nights, we count the months of this hardhearted season over and over, wondering when it will end. No matter though. The winter insists upon staying, teasing us with snowmen and the chance to make angels in the snow. But it is cold and the cold can make us bitter.

Springtime is the land awakening. The March winds are the morning yawn.
Lewis Grizzard

Spring knocks. It a funny season, perhaps underrated, undervalued, and flies past us like the first weeks of a baby's life. But with its appearance, comes the most splendid rebirth of the trees, plants, flora, foliage and shrubbery. Streets that were barren in the winter and lined with naked oaks and ash come alive and form into a natural chupah.

I question not if thrushes sing, If roses load the air; beyond my heart I need not reach. When all is summer there.
John Vance Cheney

Summer then unhurriedly saunters in, and unlike winter, we grip this hale and hearty season as our burning fingers do an overloaded plastic shopping bag. It's June, then July, oh it's August already. Such are the things we hear throughout this spell: "Oh, the summer is so short"… and we rush to shmooze with our neighbours, trying to recall their names, knowing soon we will hibernate away from each other in different forests, disconnected once again.

We live in a land where each season has a distinct personality. The fall is demure, winter is stern, spring is trusting and the summer is sexy. We see, feel, smell and taste the seasons, and if we could talk to them, it would be as if we were conversing with one we love; in which the relationship we share is complex and effortless.

The seasons are powerful. They are mighty. They are reminders – natural bulletin boards of sorts.

Spring is almost here. When it arrives, we will forget these chilly days and embrace its welcoming warmth and the birth of many gardens. To every season, there is a reason.

Israeli candidates battle voter apathy

The leaders of the three largest parties – from left, Amir Peretz of Labor, Ehud Olmert of Kadima and Benjamin Netanyahu of Likud – are campaigning hard, but voter turnout on March 28 is expected to be even lower than in 2003, when it dropped to 69 per cent. [Isranet and Israel Sun photos]

TEL AVIV — Shimon Peres joins a young couple having lunch at a seaside restaurant and asks them who they are voting for in Israel's upcoming election. They smile nervously, glance up at the swarm of photographers and TV cameras that surround the former prime minister and admit the truth: they don't know.

"No one has convinced us what the right path is and we ourselves don't even know, making it harder," said Nurit Novak, 26, as Peres, clad in a leather bomber jacket and campaigning for the Kadima party, moves on to the next table. There are many voters left to woo.

Yarin Yeger, a 20-year-old soldier, strolling along a nearby boardwalk, says she too feels adrift politically.

"I don't see any of the candidates as potentially good prime ministers," she said.

Campaigners in the March 28 election are battling voter apathy and indecision, concepts once alien to this country that for decades had voter turnout of about 80 per cent and in which most people had a political camp to which they were committed.

Polls describe about 20 per cent of the population as "floating voters" – still undecided this close to the election date.

Many voters feel that none of the candidates have the stature or pull of Israel's prime minister, Ariel Sharon, who has been in a coma since a Jan. 4 stroke.

"There is great confusion because Sharon is no longer at the helm, and people have lost their balance," said Nitza Hameiri, 56, a real-estate appraiser.

There is little sense of election excitement despite dramatic changes – a prime minister who lies comatose, leaving behind his new party; a Sephardi Jew leading the Labor party for the first time; and Hamas' recent victory in Palestinian elections.

Voter turnout is expected to be lower than in past elections. In 2003, it was already low, with slightly less than 69 per cent of registered voters casting ballots.

The assumption that Kadima will trounce its rivals contributes to a sense of ennui, observers say. In the most recent polls, Kadima is predicted to win between 37 and 39 seats in Israel's 120-seat Knesset. Those seeking change are finding it in Kadima, breaking down the Israeli electorate from its former pattern of left versus right.

Gaza settler adapts to new life

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

ASHKELON, Israel — Ronit Balaban has begun her life anew in the shadow of the sky-high smokestack of Ashkelon's massive power plant, a target of Palestinian Qassam rockets.

Here, on three hectares of land developed by the Jewish National Fund, Balaban, a 49-year-old farmer who lived in the adjacent Gaza Strip until recently, tends to her plastic greenhouses in an attempt to resurrect what she painfully lost after Israel's unilateral withdrawal last summer.

Ronit Balaban

"I'm happy and proud of my business," said Balaban, the owner of a nursery that produces potted flowers for markets in Israel and Europe.

In a poetic flight of fancy, she added, "Our essence is to be happy farmers in the State of Israel."

An immigrant from Sweden who arrived in Israel in 1971, she lived in the settlement of Ganei Tal with her sabra husband, Jacob, for 23 years.

One of 21 outposts in Gaza inhabited by some 8,000 Jews, Ganei Tal was evacuated by Israel last August following a tumultuous national debate that altered the complexion of Israeli politics and set the Palestinians on the road toward statehood.

"We thought it was the entrance to paradise," she said dreamily of Ganei Tal, which in Hebrew means garden dew. "We had a very good life there. This is where we raised our three children."

The News in Brief

CANADA

Jews 'Too Influential'

TORONTO — Canada's "pro-Israel Jewish lobby" is "too influential" on Canadian foreign policy, the Canadian Islamic Congress says. The group was responding to Canada's shift at the United Nations, where a recent resolution backing the right of Palestinian refugees to return to Israel passed 41-2, with Canada and the United States opposed. On March 10, president Mohamed Elmasry said Canada is "blindly follow[ing] the lead of Washington and of the influential pro-Israel Jewish lobby in both countries. This is a slap in the face to traditional Canadian values."

WORLD

Manor Gets Extension

JERUSALEM — Israel's Supreme Court last week gave Boaz Manor another month to turn in $9 million in diamonds he allegedly bought with assets from failed hedge fund Portus Alternative Asset Management, the Globe and Mail reported. Manor, co-founder of Portus, faced jail time from a lower court if he did turn in the gems, which he says he doesn't have. Manor, 35, fled to Israel last year after Toronto-based Portus went bankrupt and faces Ontario Securities Commission charges over its collapse.

Yankee Doodlers

TEHRAN — Six U.S. artists have reportedly entered an Iranian newspaper's Holocaust cartoon contest. One cartoon shows an Israeli soldier pointing a gun at a Palestinian's head with the words, "What has Ariel Sharon learned from the Holocaust?" Its creator, left-wing illustrator Mike Flugennock, denied it's anti-Semitic. "It specifically addresses policies of the Israeli state with regard to its behaviour in Palestine, and their similarities to the strategies employed by the Nazi regime in Warsaw and elsewhere," he told AP. The Iranian contest came after a Danish paper printed controversial cartoons of the Islamic prophet Muhammad.

Rabbis Protest at UN

NEW YORK — Some 150 rabbis from the four major streams of Judaism gathered outside the United Nations March 13 to urge the world to halt the deaths of Sudanese fleeing government-backed Arab militias who have killed thousands in Darfur, Sudan. The rabbis likened atrocities there to Jewish suffering in World War II. "It was only two generations ago when we looked around and wondered, where was everyone?" said Rabbi Robert Levine, head of the New York Board of Rabbis.

Rabbi Tours Mosque

ROME — Rome's chief rabbi, Riccardo Di Segni, visited his city's main mosque last week. Muslim leaders gave him the tour as part of efforts at greater dialogue after the Muhammad cartoon controversy.

Falwell Clears Air

LYNCHBURG, Va. — Evangelist Jerry Falwell corrected the "misimpression" that he believes Jews can reach heaven without converting. "While I am a strong supporter of the State of Israel and dearly love the Jewish people and believe them to be the chosen people of God, I continue to stand on the foundational biblical principle that all people… must believe in the Lord Jesus Christ in order to enter heaven," Falwell said on the Conservative Voice website in response to a report he accepts the idea Jews have a separate covenant with God allowing them entrance to heaven.

French Comic Fined

PARIS — A French court fined comedian Dieudonné M'bala M'bala for suggesting Jews were slavers. Dieudonné faced controversy over a sketch in which he donned haredi clothing and gave a Nazi salute. He was cleared last year of incitement charges related to that sketch, but was fined more than 5,000 euros for a 2004 interview in which he said, "Those who attack me founded their fortunes on the trade in blacks and slavery." The court called the remark an attack on Jews. Dieudonné is slated to co-host three shows in July at Montreal's Just for Laughs festival, where he has performed the past three years.

Mock Gas Chamber Temporarily Shut Down

BERLIN — Officials in a German town temporarily suspended an exhibit in which a Spanish artist filled a former shul with poison gas after the head of Germany's main Jewish group called it a "tasteless art spectacle."

Santiago Sierra, who said he was protesting the "banalization of Holocaust remembrance," pumped exhaust fumes from six cars into the former synagogue in Pulheim-Stommeln near Cologne. Visitors wore gas masks to enter the installation, titled 245 Cubic Metres, which was to run Sundays through April 30, except for Easter. There were reportedly long lines waiting to enter on opening day, March 12.

Stephan Kramer, head of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, said it's one thing to question rote forms of remembrance, but filling a shul with poison gas "has absolutely nothing to do with remembrance or the culture of memory."

Rebuilding the Jaslo Synagogue — in Forest Hill

Special to the CJN

The Forest Hill Village, along trendy Spadina Road, is known more for coffee shops, bakeries and boutiques than prayer shawls and outdoor Torah parades.

But the six-year-old Temmy Latner Forest Hill Jewish Centre is quickly changing all that. On March 26, supporters will gather for a fundraising dinner to celebrate the centre's ambitious vision for its own future – a new building that has deep historical roots.

[Jennifer M. MacLeod photo]

Starting with just a few individuals and couples, the centre, a branch of the Israel-based outreach organization Ohr Somayach, has grown and now regularly welcomes more than 200 people on Shabbat.

In the heart of the Village, just above Starbucks and across from an orthodontist, Rabbi Elie Karfunkel and his wife Rifky have built a warm, vibrant, traditional congregation that's already bursting out of its new location, one created by merging and renovating three adjacent offices.

But rather than design a new building from scratch, the congregation will recreate the exterior of the lost synagogue of Jaslo, Poland, in what is believed to be the first time a North American congregation has physically rebuilt a European shul.

The original was destroyed in September 1939. German soldiers set it ablaze and the fire was put out by Polish firefighters – who were ordered five days later to burn it to the ground.

Reproducing this stately, old-world building will serve as a living monument to Hitler's failure to extinguish the Jewish spirit, said centre member Jesse Kaufman. "[The Nazis] succeeded in destroying the building 60 years ago. Now it will be rebuilt, filled with singing – people choosing to be Jewish in a vibrant, democratic society."

The town of Jaslo was a deliberate choice. John Kaplan, grandson of the late philanthropists Joseph and Faye Tanenbaum, said that "there were great synagogues in cities like Warsaw," but the centre chose a "nondescript" synagogue to represent "forgotten" communities and people.

BETH TIKVAH SYNAGOGUE is pleased to present a discussion of Steven Spielberg's
"Munich"
Wednesday March 29th at 8:00 p.m.
Join Rabbi Wayne Allen and
Gerald Ziedenberg, Chair
Beth Tikvah Jewish Education Centre as they try to answer some troubling questions.
Munich – the movie – has stirred a great deal of controversy. Is it anti-Israel or even anti-Semitic? Is it fair and balanced, should it be fair and balanced? Are targeted assassinations morally and ethically correct? Is there a political purpose, do targeted assassinations send the intended message? We can question the mundane: is it a good movie, or as one Israeli put it, is it simply another American action film?
Why has Spielberg, a champion of the Jews and the State of Israel made such a film? Why was he compelled to tell this story? Has his thinking towards us changed?
The movie will not be screened.
All are invited to attend. There is no charge.

Out of the news, not forgotten

From the editor's desk

The following small, almost innocuous report was aired on Israeli television last Friday.

"Ariel Sharon, comatose since suffering a massive stroke on Jan. 4, will be moved to a long-term care facility after elections later this month. The [Israeli] prime minister will be moved to the Sheba Medical Center [outside Tel Aviv]."

Prime Minister Sharon's condition is quite grave. But it is now hardly ever mentioned in public discourse. What is more, it probably hardly ever arises now in private thought too.

Such is human nature that the mind cannot too long dwell on the melancholy and the morose without harming its emotional equilibrium.

Such is the nature of nations that a government cannot too long dwell on the individual without harming the national, collective interest.

Sharon is not forgotten. He is simply no longer in the news.

Each day that the stricken prime minister remains in a coma, the prognosis for his recovery worsens. Since a stroke 2½ months ago, he has undergone seven operations, including three brain surgeries.

In five days, on March 28, Israelis will go to the polls to elect a new Knesset. Though Sharon's image is very much part of the election campaign – an unsubtle detail on many of Kadima's campaign posters – the man himself is not. Nor will he ever be again. He is not returning to political life.

But his impact on Israel's political life will be long lasting and long studied.

An insightful, moving essay about Sharon, entitled The General, appears in the Jan. 23 and 30 issue of The New Yorker.

But what makes the article especially poignant is the fact that it was written by an "ideological foe" of Sharon, the well-known, left-of-centre Israeli journalist, political commentator Ari Shavit.

It is a seamlessly stitched manteau of notes from the last six years of conversations between the two men that adds warmth and dimension to one's understanding of Israeli life.

Even as Shavit chronicles the macro movements and shifts in national policy and social climate over that six-year period, he also paints with richly colourful, micro detail, the inner aspects of the private man who was largely responsible for those movements and shifts.

The differences he discovers between the general he actually came to know and the general whose personality he assumed he knew are profound.

Shavit surprises even himself. He liked and developed great respect for Sharon.

In 1999, Shavit wrote, "Surprisingly, this secular, Israel-born soldier defined himself not as an Israeli but as a Jew. Israel's raison d'etre, he said, is to be the place where the Jews will finally be cured of their mortal illness, their 'eternal wandering'…

"He said that his primary concern was with the Jewish future: what will become of the Jews in 30 years' time, and what will become of them in 300 years' time?"

In reference to a meeting on Sharon's ranch in April 2001, Shavit wrote: "Affable as always, he insisted that I eat a large breakfast with him: salad, cheese, sardines and olives. During the meal, he said he would prefer that we not talk about politics. 'I know more about wheat and olive trees than I do about politics,' he said, laughing. And indeed, he gave me a long lecture about the olive tree: its longevity, the depth of its roots. He told me that in Israel there are olive trees that are 2,000 years old and were harvested by the Jews during the Second Temple period, from 538 BC to 70 AD. He described their precise location."

"I asked Sharon whether he was closer to the settlers he was about to displace or to his new supporters, who come from the trendy Mediterranean streets of Tel Aviv.

"'They are real people,'" Sharon said of the settlers. "'Extraordinary people. Phenomenal people.'

"He asked an aide to bring him his briefcase and he pulled out a letter from a woman from Netzarim, in Gaza. He read it to me, slowly and clearly, pronouncing with strange empathy every one of the words of rebuke that were directed at him…

"'She is right in her arguments,'" Sharon said, "'but she doesn't bear the responsibility for the Jewish people on her shoulders. This responsibility is incumbent upon me'…

"The day before Sharon's catastrophic stroke, I happened to be at Sycamore Ranch (the Sharon family ranch in the Negev) to meet with Omri. I did not see the prime minister, but I did see, once again, everything in which he took pride: his sheepfold, his orchard, his two sons."

The great events of history are the results of the decisions of great men and women. But those great men and women, we often forget, are human beings too, who, like all of us, reach for and hope to hold in their hands the feel of things that last, that remind them that they have a place in the hearts of others. Shavit's article is an excellent read.

Sharon is out of the news, but not forgotten.

Rebbetzins address key issues at conference

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

> 'I'm not sure what the term implies... the notion that a woman is something because of what her husband is'

Batya Friedman is a financial analyst, Ilana Kelman is an occupational therapist, Cirelle Rosenblatt is a psychologist and Shelley Zisook is a high school teacher. The four women are also Orthodox rebbetzins who travelled from their homes in Edmonton, Toronto, Vancouver and Fredericton respectively for a rebbetzins' conference held recently in Teaneck, N.J.

"They do have their own identity," said Friedman of modern-day rebbetzins. The three-day Rebbetzins Yarchei Kallah that she attended was a forum for mentoring and mutual support, as well as an opportunity for personal growth, she said.

The event – which included text study as well as sessions on time management and the role of the rabbi's wife ("Community, Confidante, Teacher and Hostess") – was a program of Yeshiva University's Center for the Jewish Future. Organizers believe it was the first program of its kind in North America.

Friedman, a 29-year-old mother of two young children whose career is on hold for the moment, said that the role of a rebbetzin is as a partner and support for her husband. Serving as a hostess – mostly at Shabbat meals, but also on other occasions – is "still a big part of the role."

She also teaches classes at Toronto's Beth Israel Synagogue, where her husband Rabbi Daniel Friedman became the rabbi in 2002, but said she didn't think the teaching was "something that was expected."

Kelman, a mother of six who worked part-time until her youngest was born seven months ago, found the conference empowering. Zisook, 53, whose husband, Rabbi Kenneth Zisook, was a U.S. army chaplain until he became spiritual leader in 2003 at Sgoolai Israel Synagogue – Fredericton's only synagogue – said it was a way of "recharging [her] spiritual batteries."

But there is some discomfort with the term "rebbetzin."

"It doesn't have a connotation that I think feels comfortable to women in their 20s and 30s," said Rosenblatt, a 36-year-old mother of five.

"I'm not sure what the term implies... the notion that a woman is something because of what her husband is," said Kelman.

"I prefer being called Shelley," said Zisook.

Kelman noted that she has never heard of a conference for spouses of, say, doctors or lawyers.

Unlike the other 30 or so women at the conference, Kelman is not married to a congregational rabbi, although her husband, Rabbi Jay Kelman, was spiritual leader of Toronto's Beth Jacob V'Anshei Drildz Congregation for nine years. He is a founding director of Torah in Motion, a modern Orthodox adult education organization in Toronto. Both at the synagogue and with Torah in Motion, Kelman has taken a "behind the scenes" role, mostly helping out with programs.

Among the issues facing rebbetzins, said Kelman, is the spillover from their husbands' work life. "There are a lot of demands on family time," she said. "There aren't necessarily the boundaries of 9 to 5."

Like Kelman, Zisook does "a lot of behind the scenes stuff." She also teaches a Grade 1 Hebrew-school class and is the de facto kosher caterer, cooking for up to 60 or 70 people at events like Shabbatons.

The rebbetzins' conference was "definitely worth the schlep," said Zisook. "You can't talk to congregants the same way you would talk to a best friend who wasn't a congregant."

Friendships were formed at the event, the women said, and e-mails are being exchanged.

It was "a good chance for us to learn from each other," said Rosenblatt, whose husband, Rabbi Andrew Rosenblatt, has led Vancouver's Schara Tzedeck Congregation for almost three years.

In a city like Vancouver with a relatively small Orthodox community, she is called on as a resource more than she would be in a large Jewish community, she noted.

At first, she said, she was hesitant about going to the conference because the event coincided with a planned vacation. "Why would I want to go and be a rebbetzin when we're away, instead of having the time to myself?" she thought. But the issues that were to be addressed struck a chord.

"Most of us marry our husbands – and [then] they become pulpit rabbis," she explained.

Complaint against High Holy Days class cancellations filed by prof

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A York University professor filed a complaint with the Ontario Human Rights Commission as part of an ongoing attempt to force the university to change its practice of cancelling classes on the Jewish High Holy Days.

Since the fall of 2004, David Noble has challenged the university's practice of cancelling classes on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur because, he said, it violates the 1965 York University Act and is against the law.

He said the act contains a clause forbidding the imposition upon any member of the university community of "any religious observances according to the regulations of any particular denomination or sect."

After having dealt with York president Lorna Marsden, the senate, the provincial Ministry of Training, Colleges and Universities and Fiona Crean, York's ombudsperson, to no avail, Noble took matters into his own hands and cancelled classes on Eid-ul-Fadr, a Muslim holiday, in hopes this might force the university to rethink its policy.

Noble said that when a Jewish student celebrates Rosh Hashanah or Yom Kippur, they don't have to worry about missing a class.

"But when a Muslim student goes to celebrate Eid and misses classes, although they are not penalized, they are still missing something."

As York continued to defend its policy that it has enforced since 1974 in recognition that about 10 per cent of its student body is Jewish, Noble filed a complaint in early January with the Ontario Human Rights Commission (ORHC).

Named in the complaint were Marsden, York University senate chair Patricia Bradshaw and dean of the faculty of arts Robert Drummond, as well as the institution itself. All are accused of "discrimination on the basis of creed."

Noble said since he's Jewish, "these practices are not harmful to me. This is sort of a class-action suit. I'm representing the interests of students of other faiths."

Noble added he thinks the university should either extend the practice to students of all faiths or eliminate it altogether.

But York spokesperson Richard Fisher said that to extend the practice to all students would be too difficult.

"There are probably about 100 to 200 religious holidays each year," he noted.

"We have good accommodations for students who need to miss classes for religious reasons or otherwise."

When the university formally responds to the OHRC complaint, which Fisher said it is in the process of doing, the commission will schedule a mediation in an attempt to help the two parties reach a settlement.

But Noble doesn't see how they will be able to come to the middle on this issue.

"Either they stop [the practice] or they don't," he said, adding that he is "cautiously confident" that he will succeed in bringing this policy to an end.

Fisher wouldn't speculate as to what the outcome to the dispute might be, because the process could take months or even years, but he did say the university will be defending its current policy.

Three Wishes gets pulled

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Toronto District School Board (TDSB) has joined the York Region District School Board in removing a controversial book about the Middle East from a children's after-school reading program.

The TDSB announced last week it was pulling Three Wishes: Palestinian and Israeli Children Speak from the Ontario Library Association's Silver Birch reading program and removing it from school and library shelves. Children in Grade 7 and up will still be able to borrow the book from a librarian or school office.

The move came after Canadian Jewish Congress asked the TDSB and other school boards across the province to reconsider whether Three Wishes was appropriate for children in grades 4, 5 and 6. Congress argued the book failed to provide sufficient historical context to the conflict while demonizing the Israeli army and making suicide bombing appear as a legitimate recourse for Palestinian children.

In other developments, the Avon Maitland District School Board in southwestern Ontario announced it had evaluated Three Wishes and would continue to offer it to its students.

Choosing a cabinet – and continued conflict

Palestinian prime minister-designate Ismail Haniyeh took one step closer last weekend to forming a new government in the Palestinian Authority. He appointed a 24-member cabinet of colleagues and confederates, all from his own Hamas party, to execute a program of constant conflict with Israel.

So great is the distrust of Hamas' power and ultimate purposes among other Palestinian political factions that none of them in the 134-seat Palestinian Legislative Council joined the cabinet. Indeed, even the murderous Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine refused to take a seat at the table.
